or at least will not beleeue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinkes, nor meats, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselues with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinkes farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodyes are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euertit; Whom no force could ouermaster, Voluptuousnesse ouerturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harueſt time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vsing these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but hee gaue them another ouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to bee auenged of his enemies, when hee pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him; till which time hee bare his affliction with patience: but it was truely said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is conuerted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending backe of the Arke.

THe Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first incounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successiuely in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazer the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazer the third, Abisua the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fift, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixt, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Tyrannus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadoch and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Dauid witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that hee forsooke the habitation of Shilo: euen the Tabernacle where hee dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c. 1 Sam. 2.22. 1 King. 2.27. and 1 Chron. 6. [Psal. 78.]

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did hee permit the Chaldæans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would haue obserued his Lawes, and serued him onely: which whensoeuer they did, they were then 1 Sam. 5. v. 6. victorious. For after the captiuitie they had no Arke at all, nor in the times of the Maccabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that guarded themselues by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne, Dauid witnessed when hee fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would haue carried the Arke with him; hee forbad it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, vsing these words: If I shall finde fauour in the 2 Sam. 15. eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleeued that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in 10
Troy, the Citie should neuer be ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made beleeue, the very Crosse whereon Christ died; and yet they lost the battell, their bodyes and the wood. But Chrysostome vpon Saint Matthew (if that be his worke) giueth a good iudgement, speaking of those that wore a part of Saint Iohns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preseruatiue: Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus, quomodò proderunt in Collo? If these words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reuerence of the Father, that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant; and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the 20 other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glory which euer they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and set it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboue to the ground, and lay vnder the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and set it vp, and set it againe in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, shewing, that it had nor power nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were sundred from the armes. For God and the diuell inhabite not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure 30 the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which neuer had beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining vpon the earth which had bin long obscured by Idolatrie, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet findes he none out but friuolous. For not onely this old Diuell did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole 40 rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victory, God strooke them with the grieuous disease of the Hemorrhoides, of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written, that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered, that the Arke should be remoued from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the fiue great Cities of the Philistims; to proue, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and receiued by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the 1 Sam. 5. Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekron 50 or Accaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out, that themselues and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the aduice of their Priests, the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolue to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Israel, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his seruice by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to bee almightie, & that their owne Idols were subiect thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vsing these words; So yee shall giue glory to the God of Israel, that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemie doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quò nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the liuing God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor, and Darius, when they had seene his miracles by Daniel. c. 6. v. 5.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hæmorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not beene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to be framed: but they durst not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Arke of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel: then they should resolue that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not be forced from their Calues, but that they would haue followed them whereseuer; much lesse when they were left to themselues would they trauell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calues be remoued from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and desarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine trauelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fieldes thereof, to wit, of one Iosua of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had beene taught accordingly: he strook them more grieuously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fiftie thousand and seuentie. From hence the Arke was carried to Kiriath-iearim, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeares in the charge of Eleazar his sonne, vntill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the meane while the Arke was in Nob, Mispah, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time seuered from the Arke; or at least, it was for the [a] present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-iearim.

§. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Gouernment.

THese Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a childe, became now Iudge and Gouernour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of [b] Chore or Korach. For Leui had three sonnes; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore: and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Leuite, was called an Ephratæan; not that the Leuites had any proper inheritance, but because he was of [c] Mount Ephraim, like as Iesse, Dauids father was called an Ephratæan, because he was of Ephrata, or Bethlem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares; it being an exceeding shame to the Iewish women, to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham that his seed should multiply as the Starres of Heauen, and the Sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seuenth; There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner borne, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his seruice, to which she deliuered him euen from the dugge. For as the first borne of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were fiue yeares old for fiue sheckles, and between fiue yeares and twentie for twentie sheckles: so was it not required by the Law that any of the race of the Leuites should bee called to serue about the Tabernacle, till they were fiue and twentie yeares.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the Writers of holy Scriptures, to whom vsually this name of a Prophet was giuen, & yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise vp vnto thee a Prophet like vnto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as beforetime in Israel, when a man went to seeke an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let vs goe to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldæan Paraphrast hath it, those reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherin Samuel iudged were Matspa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Beniamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

1 Sam. 13. See in this booke, c. 12. §. 1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of Warre at Mispa in the beginning of Samuels gouernment, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites strucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to dispetse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall he thunder vpon them, &c. Iosephus affirmes, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosequution of their victorie. After which, Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called, Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and aduantage of the victorie, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not bee assaulted from diuers parts at once, hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite, toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath beene elsewhere said.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as hee was sacrificing it was told him that the enemies approched, he nothing dismaied, answered, Ego autem sacrifico. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

CHAP. XVI.

OF SAVL.

Of the deliberation to change the gouernment into a Kingdome.

AVL when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to vnder-goe the burthen of so carefull a gouernment, hee put off from himselfe the weight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abiah, who iudged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very vtmost towards the South of Iudæa. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselues no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it driueth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discerne the errours of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of gouernment, and to make them a King, by whom they might bee iudged as other Nations were, who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruite no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernment from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choyce of a King.

an affaire of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought by counsaile from God: which surely hee did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes, who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dissuade them: which when he perceiued to be ouer-feeble, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee foretolde was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is forstill by free consent of the Subiects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Charioteers, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subiects both the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground not lesse profitable and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Oliue trees, and giue them to his seruants; with other oppressions, this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subiects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God foreshewes this change of gouernment from Iudges to Kings; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby foreshewing what power, seuered from pietie (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should bee iudged with righteous iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, or a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because hee was falsly accused, and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aequitas, non est aequitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quaest iniquitas & simulatio; Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is therein doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all, being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Onely thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoeuer they pleased, in the greatest things, and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their own brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though Dauid confessed his offence for the death of Vriah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of gouernment, it was not onely fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perciued by Iacob in his Scripture: The Scepter Gen.49.
shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: Gen.15.
Gen.17.
Beeing assuredly assured that his issues should in number equall the starres in heauen, and that Kings should proceed of him. Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall, and the excellency thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath beene by many iudicious men handled and prooued, I shall not need to ouer-paine that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges euery man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outragious slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeares: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts, and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which Deut.11. that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they sought to bee cleered from the sonnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which 1.Sam.8.
Samuel vsed, insisting vpon this point, that they would haue a king, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent euery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

Deut.17.15.

Hier that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Maspah, hee forbare the election of a king, till such time as hee was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to annoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, & made a feast for the entertainement of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers daies to seeke his fathers Asses, at length, by the aduice of his seruant, trauelled towards Ramath, to find a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which iourney it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Asse, and not a kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Iethro; and after to make choyce of 1.Sam.16.
Dauid the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts, and changed his sheephooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious king of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Iames were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe; but permanent and euerlasting in Gods euerlasting kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the king, whom hee expected, and stayed his arriuall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, aboue all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdome, and of Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should incounter him by Rahels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophecie with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moyses, Iosua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Elisæus, Esay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora pererrunt, præterita, præsentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of, 1. Cor. 14. 14. who inriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law. Chrys. in Ps. 43.

At Mispeth Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betweene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinkes by the answer of * Vrim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mysterie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others have remembred divers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be vndertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisory; the third, Divinatory; and vnto one of these three all may bee reduced: all which kinds howsoever they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus consters it, and as it may bee gathered by his former answeres to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offring him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoide sedition, took no notice. 1. Sam. 10.

* The Vrim and Thummim in the ornaments of the High Priest, were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum, they were placed in the pectorall ouer against the hart of the High Priest. It is plaine that they were not the precious stones, nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. c. 28. Cic. de diuin. Paus. in Mes.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the kingdom, but that he received knowledge that Nahas king of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephta, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorite, & then Israel dispossest them of, which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephta's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselues of more aduantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselues to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre; and besides had vsed vsed great care and policie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites, and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it self inuited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse: since the Israelites de-Iudg.21. stroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites; at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their young women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue beene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themselues of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deepely wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransome themselues, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himselfe in his first yeeres reigne, and because perchance hee was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoeuer came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so should his Oxen be serued: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to giue Nahas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue seuered themselues from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezec, neere Iordan, that he might readily passe the riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arriue at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

1.Sam.11.8. The armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hee returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselues of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might set on them on all sides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troope inforced them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselues and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe, the people were so farre in loue with their new king, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

1.Sam.11. After the armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed king: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a re-
1.Sam.12. hearsall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good gnard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Ionathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall reiection.

IOnathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to haue beene Cariath-iearim: becauſe a place where the Philiſtims had a Garriſon, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderſtand of Cariath-iearim: but Iunius vnderſtands this Garriſon to haue beene at Gebah in Beniamin neere Gibba, where Ionathan abode with his thouſand followers. Howſoeuer, by this it appeareth that the Philiſtims held ſome ſtrong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Iſrael: and now being greatly inraged by this ſurprize, they aſſembled thirty thouſand armed Chariots, and ſixe thouſand Horſe, wherewith they inuaded Iudea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hieruſalem, and in the middeſt of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this ſudden inuaſion the Iſraelites were ſtrucken in ſo great a feare, as ſome of them hid themſelues in the caues of the mountaines; other fledde ouer Iordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himſelfe with ſome 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, ſtaid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the paſſage of Ioſua when he led Iſrael ouer Iordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel ſeuen daies: but when the laſt day was in part ſpent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminiſh greatly, he preſumed (as ſome expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exerciſe the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Eccleſiaſticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and ſo make the ſinne of Saul not to haue beene any intruſion into the Prieſts office, but firſt a diſobedience to Gods Commandement, in not ſtaying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. ſecondly a diffidence or miſtruſt in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the ſtrength of the people, whoſe departing from him he could not beare patiently; and laſtly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of ſo godly a man might procure him. But whatſoeuer was his ſinne, notwithſtanding his excuſes, he was by Samuel reprehended moſt ſharply, in termes vnfitting his eſtate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene giuen to Samuel ſo to doe, from God himſelfe; at which time alſo Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome ſhould be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his poſteritie.

1 Sam. c. 13. verſe 14.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to conſiſt of 600. men: for the moſt were fled from him and ſcattered, yea and among thoſe that ſtaid, there was not any that had either ſword or ſpeare, but Saul and his ſonne Ionathan onely. For the Philiſtims had not left them any Smith in all Iſrael, that made weapons; beſides, they that came to Saul came haſtily, and left ſuch weapons and armour as they had, behind them in their garriſons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul ſhould be able the yeere before, or in ſome part of this very yeere, to ſuccour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thouſand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themſelues withall, ſaue onely in the hand of Saul and Ionathan his ſonne. But howſoeuer, all the reſt of the people were formerly diſarmed by the Philiſtims, and all thoſe crafteſmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Iſraelites only files to ſharpen and amend ſuch ſtuffe as ſerued for the Plough, and for nought elſe: yet that they had ſome kind of armes it is manifeſt, or elſe they durſt not haue attempted vpon the Philiſtims as they did. And it is not ſaid in the Text that there was not any ſword in all Iſrael, but onely that there was not any found among thoſe 600. ſouldiers which ſtayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it ſeemeth that when Samuel had ſharpely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forſooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie ſouldiers, and of all the reſt that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arriued.

1 Sam. 13. 19.

1 Sam. 13. 22.

With this ſmall troope he held himſelfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more ſtrength, and better aſſured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obſcure how it ſhould come to paſſe that the Philiſtims ſhould thus diſarme the moſt part of the Iſraelites, howſoeuer in the time of Samuel much had beene done againſt them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by ſword or ſpeare, but by thunder from heauen: and when theſe crafteſmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Iſrael, no maruell if they could not in a ſhort peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannie of the Philiſtims is to bee vnderſtood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so euen to the times of Saul kept them from hauing any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Iudea: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philistims had not inuaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could vse the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Ionathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he were discouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and iealousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoyled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselues in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that propheste in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

1 Sam. 14

This done, the small armie of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euening, yet his sonne Ionathan being infeebled with extreame labour and emptinesse, tasted a drope of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemes to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselues quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vndertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiuing the commandement of God by Samuel, hee inuaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Ægypt; in which warre hee tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Ægypt in Moses time: hee notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserued the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how seuerely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselues vpon that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation aboue 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childelesse, so shall thy mother be childelesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, vntill the day of his death. 1 Sam. 15. 33.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betweene the reiection of Saul and his death.

10 NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome, he sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdome or foresight, wherewith God 20 hath inricheth the minde of man, for his preseruation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Ishai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of Dauid, the youngest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other fiue brethren, made choyce of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, & left in the field to attend his flocke; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it 30 long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloudy minde he continued till he died, ouercome in battell by the Philistims. 1 Sam. 16.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might bee repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often iniured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselues equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their for- 40 mer wars had for the most part beene agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, wherby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battel, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betweene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been con- 50 founded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroake from heauen were to bee feared. Goliah of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vndertooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliah, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensiue or defensiue than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should haue yeelded themselues as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deseruing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then 1.*Sam.*16.13. became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliah; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote

1.*Sam.*22.18. with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe, and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemie to God and his people, and also spared and preserued the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel; had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of 1.*Sam.*24.23.2 Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Ionathan, for pittying and pleading Dauids innocencie; as also once before for tasting the honie, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparatiue for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Diuell this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neerest & faithfull seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iabes stolne their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Acts 13.21. Israel, together with Samuel, 40. yeeres, & by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres according Cedren. pa. 69. to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained; for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: vpon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, entring Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Cadoman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, saith he, was thirtie yeares old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeares, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth yeare of Samuel, Æneas Siluius the sonne of Posthumus beganne his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirtie yeares. There are who place before him Latinus Syluius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleuenth of Samuel, Dercilas sate in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire fortie yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselues generally by one name, and yet euery seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha, Deucalion & his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores hauing first inhabited sundry parts of Thessalie, did afterward seate themselues about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne vse some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achæus and Ion. Of these two, Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian inuaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Countrie Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wiues name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, inuaded Peloponnesus, and ouer-comming the Achæans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achei had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achei driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Ionas, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that Ion and Achæus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the sonne of Orestes in that Warre.

Thus were the Ionas driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remoue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof; on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionas into Asia hath beene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must bee allegorically vnderstood. But the most approued Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these 12. great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Bore aliue, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the Riuer Alpheus into it: The sixt was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalus: The seuenth was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeues from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be heere set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselues. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his trauailes to bee the twelue signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, OEchalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as eyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Theeues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeuours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persequuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-childe of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycenæ, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madnes he had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great iealousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiues and Concubines aboue threescore children. These children Eurystheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainement, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclidæ. It is said of him, that being dead, hee obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to me, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicilie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurysteus was slaine, they tooke Atreus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidæ marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoide effusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ, a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atreus; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enioy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidæ should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hylus was slaine, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Aristodemus (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that countrey, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achæi, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurysthеus foure generations.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Mæones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamaan, who gaue name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to * Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seuen more of this name to haue florished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the natiue Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Iuda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Meleſigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe ὁμηρεῖν: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also ᵇ Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer florished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres: and about 250. yeeres before the building of Rome; making him to haue florished about the time of Iehoſaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus aboue named, mention authors that make him much ancienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may gueſſe of the difficultie, and so pardon the errours in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponneſus: and * Eratoſtenes after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the armie of Greece, sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Soſibius saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which he seekes to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander; Philochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Ariſtarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirmes that he liued while Ageſilaus gouerned Lacedæmon; and that Lycurgus in his yong yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprise against the Græcians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Euſebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of Ioas King of Iuda, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie he notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, hee reckoneth many other Greeke writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Muſæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Heſiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Heſiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Heſiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaues it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, wherein hee confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Heſiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluij reigned in Alba, about * 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. ᵇ Euthymenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acaſtus the sonne of Pelias, King of of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but onely to shew the vncertainty and disagreement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the iniquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Semyes, or after Macrobius, Sentemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanephersobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

And besides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp somwhat neerely together, sixe Kindgomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria Soba, and Damascus; the Adads made themselues Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites hauing now altered the forme of Gouernment, began to flourish vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subiected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect and grieuous slauerie; to wit, the Edomeans Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituraans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

Of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

THE hazzards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and liued as a priuate man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Ionathan the sonne of Saul, that he loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne, that Dauid would assuredly bee the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when hee pleaded his cause; Ionathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer forc't, not euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this signall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were become as his houshold seruant, and his Esquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him vpon the Harpe; wherby it was thought that he might find ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone wexed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middest of his rauing fit, at which time he threw a speare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him ease.

Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musicke: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howſoeuer it ſometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Muſicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in ſuch open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000. ſouldiers, to confront the Philiſtims withall. For hee durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his yonger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiſtims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation,) that the Philiſtims would take Dauids head, than hee their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealouſies in Saul, hee practiſed with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life; but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he ſought to murther him in his owne houſe; but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid ſought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philiſtim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both ſimplicitie and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiſtims, hee couered himſelfe in the Cane of Adullam: and after conueying ſuch of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelfe in the deſarts of Ziph, Maon and the hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſart of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his maſter Saul was knowne to proſecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to inuade Iudæa: but he bent his forces another way and ſtrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis ſuppoſing that Dauid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himſelfe aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Iſrael, ſummoneth Dauid to aſsiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiſtim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the town burnt, his two wiues, with the wiues and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gaue him comfort and aſſurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

* It ſeemeth that Simeon neuer obtained Siklag till this time, for it is ſaid in the 1. of Sam.c. 27. v 6. therefore Siklag pertaineth vnto the King of Iuda vnto this day.

This armie of the Philiſtims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſonnes were ſlaine. The newes, with Sauls Crowne and bracelets, were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the ſame Nation, who auowed (though falſly) that himſelfe at Sauls requeſt had ſlaine him. Dauid, becauſe he had accuſed himſelfe, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlaine at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gaue ſtrong euidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleeued of himſelfe to his owne preiudice. For it is held in the law; Confeſsio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis. The priſoners confeſsion muſt not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vnleſſe ſome other prooſe informe the conſcience of the Iudge. For a men may confeſſe thoſe things of himſelfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impoſsible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in iudicio ſponte de ſeipſo confiteatur, & poſtea maneat in confeſsione, id eſt ſatis. If any man in iudgement doe confeſſe of himſelfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perſeuere in his confeſsion, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre vp ſorrow, and moue compaſsion in the heart of Dauid.

1 Sam. 1. In F. de quæſt. l. 1.

The victorie which the Philiſtims had gotten, was ſo great, that ſome townes of the Iſraelites, euen beyond the riuer of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke poſſeſsion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeeme ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeeke to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediately breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victory ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, least by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

AFter the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Iebostus, according to Iosephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensiue warre, till Abner past Iordan, and entred the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Ioab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedæmonians, and the Argiues, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliah the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valor was so equall, as there suruiued not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the Armie of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundreth and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twentie of Iuda: whereof Asahel the brother of Ioab was one: who when hee would needes pursue
2 Sam. 2. Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not bee moued to quit him, hee was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroake of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Roe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrown and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, Eccles. 9. That the race is not to the swift.
Vers. 10. That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then raigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew iealousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Ioab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

2 Sam. 3. 27. ABner, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Ioab murdered; for Ioab could not endure a companion in Dauids Fauour, and in the commandement of his forces; by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbare to call him to account:
2 Sam. 3. 39. for thus much he confesseth of himselfe; I am this day weake, and these men of the sonnes of Zeruiah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Ioab, he followed him with this publike imVers. 29. precation; Let the blood fall on the head of Ioab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be he subiect to vlcers, to the leproſie, to lameneſſe, to the ſword, and to pouertie, &c. For could any thing haue withſtood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Ioab might greatly haue indangered Dauids eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of ſuch importance, that the Kings themſelues were faine to giue them great reſpect, as hath beene already ſhewed more at large. This office Ioab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himſelfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in kindred, and had beene partaker of all his aduerſities; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeede he was by nature ſo iealous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward ſlew Amaſa his owne kinſman and the Kings, vpon the ſame quarrell, taking it in high diſdaine to ſee him ioyned with himſelfe as captaine of the hoſte of Iuda; much leſſe could hee brooke a ſuperiour, and ſuch a one as had ſlaine his brother, and beene beaten himſelfe in battell. But howſoeuer Ioab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, Dauid eſteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Iſrael, excuſing the ouerſight by which he might ſeeme to haue periſhed, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquiſhed, But as a man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaid he) diddeſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyed vnawares, or whom ſubtiltie in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all vnder the Sunne are ſubiect to worldly miſeries and miſaduentures. Howſoeuer Iſboſeth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he deſpaired greatly of his eſtate, and with him all Iſrael were poſſeſt with great feare: inſomuch as two of Iſboſeths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Iſboſeth, and preſenting his head to Dauid, receiued the ſame reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue ſlaine Saul. Iſboſeth being dead, all the Elders of Iſrael repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and laſt time annointed by generall conſent.

§. IIII.

Of the flouriſhing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ieruſalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philiſtims, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

WHen Dauid was now eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, his firſt enterpriſe was vpon the Iebuſites, who in deriſion of his force, and confident in the ſtrength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid ſoone after entered: all their other forces notwithſtanding. For hauing maſtered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) hee became Lord of Hieruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebuſites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moſes and Ioſua, and after them almoſt 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwiſe: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebuſites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Iſaac, and Iacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreſtling with the Angell, and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelfe, I take it with Ioſephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at firſt, in ſcorne of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres againſt all the children of Iſrael, Ioſua, the Iudges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt Dauid.

2 Sam. 5.

When he had now poſſeſt himſelf of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatorie Embaſſadours and preſents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines and married moe wiues, by whom he had ten ſons in Ieruſalem, and by his former wiues he had ſixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philiſtims hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as wel of Iuda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his ſeat. And being encountred by Dauid at two ſeuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

2 Sam. 5.

Then Dauid aſſembled 30000. choice Iſraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the houſe house of Abinadab in Gibea to the Citie of Dauid; which businesse was interrupted by the death of Vzzah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musicke, dances, and all signes of ioyfulnesse, in which Dauid himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was vncouered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgat his regall dignity both in apparrell and behauiour, and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that shee disliked Dauids behauiour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision, but rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of Isai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. 3. This done, Dauid consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatned, not in vaine, that he would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which Dauid had made were iust, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceiue themselues, who thinke by bloud-shed & terrour of their warres, to make themselues in greatnesse like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauiour vnto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Dauids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the euerlasting Throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1. SOone after this, Dauid ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philistheorum; which place our English Geneua conuerts in these words, And Dauid tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Iudæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their inuasions, which being taken by Dauid and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Iunius in 8. c. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kinde, but infor't them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoeuer they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of Dauid were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1 Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by Isbbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheckles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured Dauid and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of Dauid (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himselfe in any battail. The second and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he inuaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not knowne. 2 Sam. 21. v. 17

The Rabbines faine that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of Dauid, which liued vnder his protection in Sauls time; but questionlesse Dauid well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, & tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which Dauid well obserued, for hee destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which Dauid made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: Dauid smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recouer his border at the riuer Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recouer his border) bee referred to Dauid or Hadadezer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinkes that the article (hee) hath relation to Dauid, who finding Tohu oppresst by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recouery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Dauid had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemie on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing Dauid was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his prouisions through those vncultiued places, by which hee was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But wee finde that Dauid returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the riuer Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria, Damascena, & of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, & the losse of his own country which adioined to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer and too soone for themselues: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. Dauid hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therin, as he did in Edom: hauing also sackt the adioyning Cities of Betah, & Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betah, Tubas: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi, whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of Dauid: partly because he had war with Adadezer, & partly because he feared Dauid now victorious. He also presented Dauid with vessels of gold, siluer, and brasse; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and 2 Sam. 8.

the beſt of all the ſpoiles of other Nations, Dauid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius tranſlated the words (clypeos aureos) by vmbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boſſes onely. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But becauſe Roboam made ſhields of braſſe in place of theſe of Adadezer, at ſuch time as Shicah the Egyptian ſackt the Temple of Ieruſalem, it may be gathered thereby that thoſe of Adadezer were golden ſhields.

2 Sam. 2. This done, Dauid ſent Embaſſadours to Hanum King of the Ammonities to congratulate his eſtabliſhment in his fathers Kingdome: for Dauid in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had beene relieued by Nahaſh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduiſed, and ouer-iealous of his eſtate, vſed Dauids meſſengers ſo barbarouſly, and contemptuouſly (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himſelfe, which neither his owne ſtrength, nor all the aydes purchaſed could put off, or ſuſtaine. For notwithſtanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thouſand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vaſſalles of Adadezer twentie thouſand, and of Maachah and Iſhtob thirteene thouſand (for which hee disburſed a thouſand talents of ſiluer) yet all theſe great armies together with the ſtrength of the Ammonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abiſhai eaſily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great loſſe or ſlaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites alſo retraited into their Cities, the one holding themſelues within the walles, the other in their deſarts adioyning, till Ioab was returned to Ieruſalem.

Maachah the North part of Traconitis remembred in Deut. 3. 14.

Iſhtob or Thob a country neere Gad vnder the rockes of Arnon. 2 Sam. 10.

Hadadezer hearing that Ioab had diſmiſſed his armie, aſſembled his forces againe, and ſent all the companies that hee could leuie out of Meſopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach paſſed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South ſide thereof. Dauid hearing of this new preparation, aſſembled all the ableſt men of Iſrael, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no leſſe diſtant from Damaſcus, towards the North-eaſt, than Ieruſalem was towards the Southweſt. Now Dauid (ſpeaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthеſt-off iourney that euer hee had) becauſe hee was now Lord of Damaſcus, which lay in the midway. Hee alſo poſſeſt himſelfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward ſtrongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two ſafe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damaſcus. In this encounter betweene Dauid and the Syrians, they loſt 40000. horſemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call theſe 40000. Souldiers footmen, and ſo Iunius conuerts it, and ſo is it very probable. For the armie of Iſrael conſiſting of footemen, could hardly haue ſlaughtered 40000. horſemen, except they quitted their horſe and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbred at 7000. in the firſt of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that ſerued in them with the conductors are included: ſo as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre againſt Dauid, before he forc't them to tribute, 100000. footemen, beſides all their horſemen and waggoners, and beſides all thoſe that Ioab ſlew, when they fled at the firſt encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbah. Notwithſtanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered ſtrength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Iuda often: but the Kings of Iſrael they impoueriſhed euen to the laſt end of that State.

Helam or Chelam which Ptolomy calleth Alamatha neere the foords of Euphrates. 2 Sam. 10.

* See c. 18. §. 2.

Dauid hauing now beaten the Arabians and Meſopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He ſent out Ioab the Lieutenant of his armies to forradge and deſtroy their territorie, and to beſiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Iſraelites maſtered and poſſeſt. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garniſhed with precious ſtones, Dauid ſet on his owne head, and carried away with him the reſt of the riches and ſpoile of the Citie. And though Dauid ſtayed at Ieruſalem, following the war of Vriah his wife, till ſuch time as the Citie was brought to extreamity and ready to be entred: yet Ioab in honour of Dauid forbare the laſt aſſault, & enterance thereof, till his maſters arriuall. To the people he vſed extreame rigour (if wee may ſo call it being exerciſed againſt heathen Idolaters,) for ſome of them hee tare with harrowes rowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tyle and bricke.

§. VII.

Of Dauids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BVt as victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicitie a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and manie times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemie (against whom he was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) he began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not onely satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vse her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adulterie with Vriahs slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant Ioab to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet anie possibilitie of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, he was content that manie others of his best seruants and souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring, and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-harueſt of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witnesse of Dauids own mouth against him, as Dauid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of manie: He then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon Dauid for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet hee deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercie in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soone after this, Dauid lost the childe of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduice of his cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah Dauids brother, possest her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a careleſse and despitefull manner. Two yeares after which foule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheepeshearing: not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone; but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the kingdome: in which, because he could not in anie sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done, he fled away, and liued vnder the saueguard of Talmai king of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the inuention of Ioab (but chiefly because of the great affection of Dauid towards his sonne) was brought againe, first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against Dauid his father, seeking by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The companie which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Ierusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, & many troupes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, so was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Ierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields and desarts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Ierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom hee desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, & seruant, praying him to make himselfe in 2.Sam.15. all his outward actions and counsels of Absaloms party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsailor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Ionathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauid prosperity had smothered, but his aduersity illightned) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most

2.Sam.16. despightfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbad Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Ierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselues, that he was irreconcileable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resoluedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without feare of being
2.Sam.17. giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betweene them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsailer) Achitophel indeed: vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and
2.Sam.c.12. v.11. giue them vnto thy neighbour, and hee shall lie with thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue aduice to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee imployed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid; which had willingly beene imbraced
2.Sam.17.v.14. by Absalom, had not Hushai Dauids faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father; than by such a troope, which Dauids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeede, after God, the losse of the one, and deliuery of the 2.Sam.17.23. other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Iordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherin Isheseth himselfe in the war against Dauid after Sauls death seated himselfe. To which place there repaired vnto him Shobi the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, whom Dauid loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the kingdome, after Hanums ouerthrow: in thankfulnesse whereof he relieued Dauid in this his extremity. There came also to Dauids assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

In the meane time both the king and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Ioab held with Dauid; an office next the king himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Ioab, Abishai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Ioab, besides that hee was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his gouernment to Amasa, and therfore the victory being obtained, & newes brought him
18. that Absalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when hee could not perswade the
16. messenger to returne and kill him, he himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him.
2.Sam.18.14.

It

It appeared alſo by the ſequell that Ioab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the diſpoſition of Abſalom, he imbraced the preſent aduantage offered. 2. Sam. 18.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and ſorrowed, not only as a man that had loſt a ſonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and ſeene euerie delight of life interred. For hee ſo hid himſelfe from his people, as thoſe which hoped for honour and reward after ſo great a victorie, couered themſelues alſo in the citie, as if they had committed the greateſt offences, and had rather deſerued death than recompence. Whereupon Ioab preſenting himſelfe before Dauid, perſwaded him to diſſemble his ſorrow for the preſent, and to ſhew himſelfe to the armie. For firſt, he told him that he had diſcountenanced his faithfull ſeruants, who had that day preſerued his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge ſo great a loue and conſtancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet reſoluedly expoſe themſelues to great perils for his ſake: but on the contrarie, grieue and lament at their good ſucceſſe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abſalom at an eaſie rate. Secondly, he vrged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies & hated his friends; and that he witneſſed by this his mourning, that he had not anie reſpect of his Princes, and others his faithfull ſeruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all periſhed, and Abſalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulneſſe and approued valour gotten.

Laſtly, he vſed this preualent argument, That if the King came not out and ſhewed himſelfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that verie night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatning, And that will be worſe vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By theſe ouer-bold and arrogant ſpeeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Ioab raiſed Dauid from his bed of ſorrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom he aſſured of his loue and affection, eſpecially Amaſa, who commanded the armie of Abſalom, to whom he promiſed the office of Lieutenantſhip; the ſame which Abſalom had giuen him, and which Ioab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amaſa were not ſatisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the ſtrength of Iſrael, now vnder his commandement. 2. Sam. 19.

This done, the King marched towards Iordan homeward, where in his paſſage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face: but this remiſsion was but externall, as appeared afterward. He alſo accepted of Mephiboſheth his excuſe, whom Ziba had falſly accuſed and betrayed. 2. Sam. 19. 23.

He alſo intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oaſt, to follow him to Ieruſalem, that he might reward his ſeruice done him; who excuſing himſelfe by his age, appointed his ſonne Chimham to attend the King. 2. Sam. 19. 38.

At Gilgal on this ſide Iordan, all the Tribes aſſembled, and after ſome contention which of them ought to haue moſt intereſt in Dauid, the Armie brake, & Dauid returned to Ieruſalem. But Sheba the ſon of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the houſe of Saul, finding ſome diſcontent among the Iſraelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a ſtranger in whom they had no intereſt, and it ſeemeth that manie of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare ſtill a good affection to the iſſues of their firſt King. Dauid imployed his reconciled Captaine Amaſa, to giue him contentment, and to witneſſe his truſt, as alſo becauſe hee conceiued that Amaſa had intereſt in thoſe reuolts of Iſrael more than Ioab had. He receiued commandement from Dauid to aſſemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee foreſlowed: but being onward on his way, Abiſhai, Ioabs brother, was ſent after him, with Dauids guard and beſt Souldiers, whom alſo Ioab accompanied: and ouertaking Amaſa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no leſſe iealous of Amaſa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the ſame manner, and out of the ſame impatient ambition. This done, hee purſued Sheba; and finding him incloſed in Abel, aſſaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the perſwaſions of a wiſe woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Ioab ouer the walls: which done, he retraited his Armie to Ieruſalem, and commanded, as before, all the Hoſt of Iſrael. 2. Sam. 20. 10. 2. Sam. 20. 11.

The next act of Dauid, was the deliuery of Sauls ſons or kinſmen to the Gibeonites, whom thoſe citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeers, came by reaſon of Saul and his houſe, to wit, for the ſlaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this ſatisfaction, both becauſe he had warrant from God himſelfe, as alſo, if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himſelfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, aſwell in the preſent as in the future, be greatly moleſted and indangered; only he ſpared Mephibоſheth the ſonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

2. Sam. 21. Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two ſonnes of Riſpah, whom ſhe bare vnto Saul, and the fiue ſonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom ſhe bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites: Iunius cals this Michol the ſiſter of her that was Dauids wife, ſnee whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the ſame which is named Merab in the firſt of Samuel the eighteenth, who was firſt promiſed to Dauid when he ſlew Goliah in the valley of Raphaim: and becauſe it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had anie humane reſpect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now where the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better tranſlation were out of the Hebrew word here vſed, hauing an eclipſis or defect, & ſignifieth, as I am informed, one of the ſame kinred, as in the 19. verſe of the ſame one and twentieth chapter it is ſaid of Goliah, whoſe ſpeare was weightie as a Weauers beame, when as by the ſame eclipſis it muſt be vnderſtood by the brother of Goliah; Goliah himſelfe being formerly ſlaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God ſecured the houſe of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; ſo did hee ſtrengthen both the King and Nation againſt forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number & qualitie, that people of Iſrael is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirty Captaines of thouſands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer theſe were ſixe Coronels, whoſe valour was ſo extraordinarie, that it might be well held as miraculous. Theſe Coronels had ſome difference of place and honour, which ſeemeth to haue beene giuen vpon meere conſideration of their vertue. For Abiſhai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre againſt the Ammonites & Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the firſt ranke, but was faine to reſt contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the ſecond order, notwithſtanding his neerneſſe of bloud vnto the King, the flouriſhing eſtate of his owne houſe, and his well approued ſeruices. All theſe Coronels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may ſeeme to haue beene ſuch as were continually retained, or at the leaſt kept in readines for anie occaſion, conſidering that the numbers which were muſtered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, verie farre exceeded thirtie thouſand, yea, or thirty times as manie. They were moſt of them ſuch as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardned with his aduerſities. Others there were verie manie, and principall men in their ſeuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but theſe Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the ſpeciall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue conſumed many of theſe excellent men of warre, ſo may it probably be gheſſed to haue waſted the moſt of thoſe whoſe deaths we find no-where mentioned. For the ſonnes of Zeruia, who had beene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and only Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abiſhai to ſtand by his ſide in his laſt extremitie.

2. Sam. 23. 39.

By the actions forepaſſed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeares or thereabouts, when the poſterity of Saul was rooted out, ſo that he enioyed about ſeuen yeeres of entire quiet and ſecuritie, wherein it pleaſed God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the ſucceſſion of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time alſo Dauid hauing eſtabliſhed all things in Iuda and Iſrael, and the borders thereof, he againe diſpleaſed God by numbring the people, as in oſtentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his Armie, who after nine nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account & register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the cities thereof fiue hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand. 2.Sam.24. 1.Chr.21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein he should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God only, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; wherof he giueth this diuine reason, For his mercies are great. 2.Sam.24.

§. VIII.

Of the last acts of Dauid; Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

LAstly, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Ammon & Absalom being now dead) hauing drawn vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, & Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon, attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the businesse publicke. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who did repaire vnto Ierusalem. 1.Reg.1. 1.chron.28.1.

In this assembly the King stood vp, & signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon hee earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conforme themselues vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution. 1.chr.29.9.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes & people, that whereas hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of siluer, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, & ten thousand of siluer, besides brasse, iron, and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of ſo religious a worke. This buſineſſe being ſo well diſpatched, a ſolemne feaſt with great ſacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, & receiued fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the ſonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus eſtabliſhed King, his Father Dauid finding himſelfe euen in the hands of death, firſt exhorted his ſonne to exerciſe the ſame courage and ſtrength of minde, which himſelfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered theſe mighty words; Take heed to the charge

1. King. 2. 3. of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his ſtatutes, and his commandements, and his iudgements, and his teſtimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moſes, &c. to the performance of which, GOD faſtened the ſucceſſion, and proſperitie of his iſſues. For
1. Kin. 1. 20. this done (ſaith GOD himſelfe) Thou ſhalt not want one of thy poſteritie to ſit vpon the Throne of Iſrael.

Secondly, he aduiſed him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had ſerued Dauid from the firſt aſſault of Ieruſalem to the laſt of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, ſauing that he faſtened himſelfe to Adonijah (his maſter yet liuing) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreuenged, ſo was it his will that Ioab ſhould drinke of the ſame cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taſte, & ſuffer the ſame violence which himſelf had vniuſtly ſtrooken others withall, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner & Amaſa of their liues, hauing againſt the one the pretence onely of his brothers ſlaughter, whom Abner had ſlaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: againſt the other but a meere iealouſie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab aſſured himſelfe that Abner & Amaſa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or ſupplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raiſed vp Benhaiah the ſonne of Iehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cauſe to Salomon againſt
1. King. 2. Ioab, that he ſlue the Captaines of the hoſte of Iſrael, and ſhed bloud of battell in peace, and to this apparant & iuſt cauſe, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon, which Ioab made manifeſt by the vntimely ſetting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioab had committed againſt Dauid, of
1. King. 2. which in theſe words he put his ſonne Salomon in minde; Thou knoweſt alſo what Ioab the ſonne of Seruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abſalom, contrary to the Kings deſire, or by the proud words vſed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abſalom; or whether it were the publiſhing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Kriah, thereby to diſgrace Salomon as deſcended of ſuch a mother, the Scriptures are ſilent. True it is, that thoſe great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themſelues exceeding inſolently towards their Princes, both in reſpect of their ſeruice done, as alſo becauſe they flatter themſelues with an opinion, that either their maſters cannot miſſe them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne manie a worthy man otherwiſe deſeruing great honour and reſpect.

He alſo gaue order to Salomon to rid himſelfe of Shimei, who not long before had caſt ſtones at Dauid, and curſed him to his face. And albeit by reaſon of his oath and promiſe Dauid ſpared Shimei all the time himſelfe liued, yet being duſt and in the graue, hee
1. King. 2. ſlew him by the hand of Salomon his ſonne. Hence it ſeemeth that King Henry the ſeuenth of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henry the eight to execute Poole as ſoone as himſelfe was buried, hauing made promiſe to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Poole vnto him, that while hee liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor ſuffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioab yeeld vnto Salomon any ſuch great profit or aſſurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, & Reſin of Damaſcus
1. King. 11. to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witneſſe, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid ſlept with his fathers, and that Ioab the Captaine of the Hoſt was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeers, and in Ieruſalem three and thirty, he died.

For his perſon, he was of ſmall ſtature, but exceeding ſtrong. For his internall gifts and graces he ſo farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was ſaid by God himſelfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Pſalmes which he wrote, witneſſe his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to

Paulinus:

Paulinus: Dauid Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; Dauid (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his harpe, and on a ten stringed Psalter heraiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightsomly & liuely than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalmes were written by Dauid, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors answering the titles of the seuerall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that onely 73. Psalmes were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius Dauid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleuen other on the sonnes of Korath; and eleuen are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which Dauid wrote not, Sixt. Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of Dauids singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three sonnes of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes Dauid the sole Author of all the Psalmes, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms onely to Dauid, which are ouer-written ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Euangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, vbi ait quòd ipse Dauid in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord, because the 109. Psalme begins thus: The Lord said vnto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are vsed both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a patterne to all the kings and princes that succeeded him.

His Story and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the seuerall parts of the bookes of Samuel which intreate chiefly of Dauid, were as it seemes written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Troians during the time of the siege, fought for succour from Dauid, and that hee stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time twixt Dauid and the Troian warre. For it is generally receiued that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Samson Iudges of Israel, about the worlds yeere 2848. and Dauid died in the yeere 2991.

Of the treasures of Dauid and Salomon.

His treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of siluer, and of brasse & yron passing all weight, which is more than any king in the world possest besides himselfe; and his sonne to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cart load, & a third of a cartload of siluer, allowing two thousand weight of siluer or sixe thousand pound sterling to euery cartload, besides threescore & seuenteene millions of French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appeare, seeing that the Iudges had not any treasure, nor any soueraign power to make leuies: but when they went to the wars, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turns gaue them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his enemies.

Therfore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very many yeeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great great reuenue, yet needs there muſt haue beene ſome other great meanes. It ſeemes that he made the vttermoſt profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Euſebius in his ninth booke and laſt chapter de preparatione Euangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Nauy in Melaxis (or as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a citie of Arabia, and from thence ſent men to digge for gold in the Iland Vrphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Euſebius (erring perhaps in this circumſtance) ſaith that this Iland is in the red Sea: from whence, ſaith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iurie. Pineda, l. 4. de rebus Salamonis, c. 1. thinkes that Dauid did this way alſo enrich himſelfe, and cyteth this teſtimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doubtleſſe he gained by conqueſt from the Canaanites & Philiſtims; beſides thoſe fruitfull vallies neere Iordan in Trachonitis & Baſan, and the beſt of Syria, and other countries bordering the Iſraelites. Theſe demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themſelues, husbanded thoſe grounds for his greateſt aduantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Ichonathan was ouer his treaſures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the townes; that Ezri was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei ouer the vineyards, and Sabdi ouer the ſtore of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the oliue trees, and Ioaſh ouer the ſtore of the oyle: alſo that hee had heards-men that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plaines, ouer his Sheepe, Camels and Aſſes. And this cuſtome of enriching themſelues by husbandrie and cattell, the ancient Kings euerie where held, both before and after Dauids time. For wee Gen.47. reade of Pharaoh, that hee ſpake to Ioſeph to appoint ſome of his brethren or of their 2.Chron.26. ſeruants, to be rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vzzia, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dreſſers of Vines: likewiſe wee reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did ſpecially conſiſt in their Heards and Flocks, whereof it were needleſſe to cyte Augeas and Admetus, or anie other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that thoſe captiues which were not imployed in husbandrie, were manie of them vſed by him in all ſorts of gainfull profeſſions, as the ancient Romanes in like maner vſed their ſlaues.

To theſe profits (beſides the tributes and impoſitions, which doubtleſſe were great, and beſides the innumerable preſents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily ſent him, by Tohu and others) wee may adde the great ſpoyles which hee found in the cities and countries which hee conquered: alſo the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation, or head money, euerie man rich or poore paying halfe a ſickle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as foureteene pence, and ſo in all it amounted to a wondrous ſumme in that Kingdome: wherein one 2.Chron.21. thouſand thouſand fiue hundred and ſeuentie thouſand fighting men were numbred by Ioab. Now although this law of capitation be thought by ſome verie learned, not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuertheleſſe they confeſſe is againſt the Hebrew expoſitions) yet Dauid vpon this occaſion is not vnlikely to haue put it in practiſe. And by theſe meanes might he be able to leaue thoſe huge treaſures to Salomon. Yet it may ſeeme that this great maſſe of gold and ſiluer left by Dauid, the leaſt part was his owne in priuate, and ſo will it appeare the leſſe wonderfull that hee left ſo much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thouſand talents of gold, and ſeuen thouſand talents of ſiluer: a great ſumme, but holding a verie ſmall proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to conſider, that the treaſures of the Sanctuarie it ſelfe were exceeding great, as needs they muſt haue been, hauing receiued continual encreaſe, without any loſſe or diminution euer ſince the time of Moſes and Ioſuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (beſides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Prieſts and Leuites) were partly raiſed out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the ſpoyles Numb.31.27. gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the country receiued benefite of the victorie, yet ſo, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the reſt, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euerie ſingle ſhare.

Out

Out of this purchaſe was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued and one in fiue hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thouſand part of the whole bootie. So in the ſpoyle of Midian, thirty two thouſand women being taken, the armie had ſixteene thouſand of them for ſlaues, and the Congregation had other ſixteene thouſand; but out of the ſixteene thouſand giuen to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the leſſer that the Armie was which had expoſed it ſelfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it conſiſted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domeſticall affaires, did receiue by ſo much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increaſed, either by ſome eſpeciall commandement, as when all the gold, and ſiluer, and other mettalls found in Ierico, were conſecrated vnto God; or by thankefulneſſe of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained againſt the Midianites without the loſſe of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as voluntarie preſents. Num. 31. 40. Ioſ 6. 19. Num. 31. 50.

Now howſoeuer the Iſraelites were many times oppreſſed, & troden down by other Nations, yet were not theſe treaſures robbed or ſpoyled; for the enemies neuer gat poſſeſſion of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwiſe be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie muſt haue bin exceeding great; as containing aboue one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Iſraelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchaſed by ſo many victories, as they obtained againſt the bordering Nations. For that this treaſurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; ſeeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Ioab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, & before them Samuel, had vſed to dedicate of the ſpoiles obtained in war, to maintaine the houſe of the Lord: the like whereof may be well preſumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conqueſt of Dauid brought into the Land far greater aboundance of riches, than any former victories had purchaſed, thoſe of Ioſua perhaps excepted: but theſe vaſt ſummes of an hundred thouſand Talents of ſiluer, may ſeeme rather to haue bin made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treaſures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the meere fruits of his owne induſtrie. 1 Chron. 26. v. 27. & 28.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifeſt how he gathered them; for he reciued of yeerely reuennues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, beſides the Cuſtomes of Spices. He had alſo ſixe rich Returnes from the Eaſt India, which greatly increaſed his ſtore. For his ſhips performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Beſides this, all Iudæa and Iſrael were now maſtered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damaſcena, of Palmyrena, of Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewiſe did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebuſites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguiſhed, though ſubjected. A Talent of gold is 770. french crowns 1 King. 10. 14. 1 King c. 9. v. 10. & c. 10. v. 29.

Into this flouriſhng eſtate was the Kingdom of Iſrael reduced by Dauid, who after 40 yeers reigne, and 70. yeers of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Ioſephus that there was hid in Dauids Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treaſures, inſomuch as Hyrcanus (who firſt of the Chiſmanai, or race of Maccabees, called himſelf King) one thouſand and threehundred yeers after, drew thence three thouſand Talents, to rid himſelf of Antiochus then beſieging Ieruſalem; & afterward Herod opening another Cell, had alſo an exceeding maſſe of gold and ſiluer therein. And it was an ancient cuſtome to burie treaſure with the dead. So the Peruvians & other Americans did the like, which being diſcouered by the Spaniards, they inriched themſelues by nothing ſo much in their firſt Conqueſt. That Salomon did burie ſo much treaſure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleeued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithſtanding all the riches which he got otherwiſe, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall conſidered that his want of mony grew from ſuch magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchres of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the 1 Chron. 19. 28. *Ioſep. Monuments of those Kings, as (by relation of the Duke of Vlika) they remained within these thirty yeeres, and are like to remaine still, are able to make report credible of the cost bestowed vpon them.

Of the Philistims, whom Dauid absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with Dauid.

OF the Philistims, whose pride Dauid was the first that absoluely mastered, in this conclusion of Dauids time somewhat heere may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Iosephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Iacob Israel. There were of them fiue Cities of pettie principalities, namely, Azotus, or Asdod, Gaza or Azzaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

Isid.l.9.19. Iosl.1.ant.17. 1.Sam.6.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures haue named, was that Abimelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

Gen.20.

The second Abimelech liued at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar in the border of Idumæa, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

Gen.26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Dauids time: perhaps the gouernment was turned into Aristocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoeuer Achis be named king of Gath, the same to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

Ibid.16. 1 Sam.18.29. 1 Sam.21.11. 1 King.2.

After him we reade of another Achis who liued with Salomon, to whom Shimei trauelled to fetch backe his fugitiue seruant, what time the seeking of his seruant was the losse of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Iudges, of Saul and Dauid, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There liued at once with Dauid, the third of the Siluij King of Alba, called Latinus Siluius, who is said to haue ruled that part of Italie fiftie yeers. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontidæ, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their gouernment, were not drawn from any inconuenience found in the rule of soueraignty, but in honor of Codrus only. For when the Græcians of Doris, a region between Phocis, & the mountain of Oeta, sought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, is was answered, that then vndoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserue the Athenian King liuing. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. yeere of Dauid, and [illegible] 38. yeeres.

Neere the same time began Ixion th[illegible] King of the Heraclidæ, the sonne of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the seco[illegible] raclidæ in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called [illegible] many yeeres after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slauerie; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like sort from the Sclaui came the word Slaue. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized vpon the country of Illyria & made it their owne by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselues by by a new name, Slaues, which is in their language glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate hauing thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden downe, and made ſeruants with their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaues, vſing the word as a name of reproach: in which ſenſe it is now currant through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and ſomewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Dauid, and ſay, that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the ſame whom Euſebius calls Labotes, and ſets him in the thirteenth yeere of Salomon. Euſeb. in Chro.

In the tenth yeere of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third ſonne of Codrus, aſſiſted by the Iones, built Epheſus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was ſlaine by the Carians, whoſe countrie he vſurped. He was buried (ſaith Pauſanias) in one of the gates of Epheſus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being ſet ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had ſubdued the Ionians (the next prouince to Epheſus on the ſea coaſt of Aſia the leſſe) he inlarged his Dominions vpon the Æoles, which ioyneth to Ionia: and that his poſteritie gouerned the Cities of Epheſus and Erythræ by the name of Baſilidæ in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponneſus, I haue * ſpoken already vpon occaſion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, wherin, with the Dores, they expelled the Achæi, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Iones ſucceeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. yeeres. The East-gate of Epheſus toward Magneſia vpon the riuer Mæander. Ariſt. l. 5. pol. c. 6 *See ch. in this 17. Ch. 9. 1. poſt medium.

The Citie of Epheſus became exceeding famous: firſt, for the Temple of Diana therin built, which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in breadth, ſuſtained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70. foote high: whereof 27. were moſt curiouſly grauen, & all the reſt of choyce marble poliſht, the worke being firſt ſet out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the firſt that receiued the Chriſtian faith, of which Timothy was Biſhop; to whom, and to the Epheſians, Saint Paul wrote his Epiſtles ſo intituled. The other Citie poſſeſt by Androclus in Æolis, was alſo vniuerſally ſpoken of by reaſon of Sibylla, ſurnamed Erythræa: who liued 740. yeeres before Chriſt was borne. S. Auguſtine auoweth that a Romane Proconſul ſhewed him in an ancient Greeke copie certaine verſes of this Propheteſſe: which began (as Saint Auguſtine changed them into Latine) in theſe words: Ieſus Chriſtus Dei filius, Saluator: Ieſus Chriſt Sonne of God, the Sauiour. Plin. l. 2. c. 58. & l. 7. c. 37.

About the time that Ioab beſieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to gouern in Egypt, the ſame that was father in law to Salomon, whoſe Epiſtles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Euſebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of Dauid, was the Citie of Magneſia in Aſia the leſſe founded, the ſame which is ſeated vpon the riuer Mœander, where Scipio gaue the great ouerthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the beſt Horſes of the leſſer Aſia bred, whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minyæ gens cognita remis.

About the ſame time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Seruius, with whom Strabo ioyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, ſaying, that to the one of theſe people the gouernment was giuen, with conditiõ that the other ſhould giue name to the city. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous ſcholler of Iſocrates. Seru. in Aeneid. 3. Strab. l. 3.

Euſebius and Caſsiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Dauid, but much miſtaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the ſon of Badezor, brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Iſrael; and between the death of Dauid, and the firſt of Achab, there were waſted about 95. yeeres.

In this time alſo Aeaſtus liued, the ſecond of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in deſcent before the State changed into a Magiſtracie of ten yeers. Some writers make it probable [illegible] the Æolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Oreſtes, poſſeſt the Citie and Iland of Lesbos about this time. In the 32. yeere of Dauid, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Ioſephus, who ſaith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Ioſephus, to miſreckon times, which in this point he doth ſo ſtrangely, as if he knew not how at all to caſt any accompt. For it is manifeſt, that Hiram ſent meſſengers, and Cedars vnto Dauid, ſoone after his taking of Ieruſalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauids reigne ouer Iſrael, when as yet hee had reigned onely ſeauen yeeres in Hebron ouer the houſe of Iuda. Wherefore it muſt needes bee that Hiram had reigned aboue 30. Euſeb. in Chro. Herod. in vit. Hom. & Strab. l. 14. Ant. 8. & cont. Ap. l. 1. 2. Sam. 5.

yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should bee giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adoniiahs death, and of Salomons wisedome.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Iuda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadours toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custome betweene Princes very ancient. Whence, wee reade that Dauid did in like sort 2 Sam. 10. salute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdome.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soon after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adoniiah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maide Abishag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoeuer hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid whom God inclined towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wise, & he that sees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick-sighted wisedome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene Concubines to a king, might not after bee touched but by a 2 Sam. 16, 21. king: whence Achitophel wished Absalon to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntil their death.
2 Sam. 2. 3. And this it seemes was the depth of Isboshethes quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid; I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wiues. And in the words of Saul vpbraiding Ionathan, that hee had chosen Dauid to the shame
1 Sam. 20. 30. of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions; as either that hee would learn such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

1 King. 2. 15. As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes: yet the kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therin, & in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely of Iacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Ionathan to Adonijah. For, as for popular election, thas it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appeares in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgal: that is, they acknowledged & established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselues a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse. 1. Sam. 11. 14. Deut. 17. 30.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himselfe also of Ioab, and three yeers after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because he had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, he tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus cals him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; Salomon chooseth wisedome, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which we may informe our selues, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impiety: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse, which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which hee had not any warrant either from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisedome our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisedome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his Kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soone hee iudged the controuersie between the two harlots. 1. §. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HEe then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is written of Dauid, that He called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name. 1. Chron. 22. 6. Tost. 9. 26. in 1. Chron.

He began the worke of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth yeer of his raign, at which time also he prepared his fleete at Esiongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written; as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Bartadas, Azarius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader. 1. King. 6. 1. Chro. 28. 29.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery month by course: he also vsed 80. thousand Masons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, he selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke; so as he paid and imployed in all one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were farre more skilfull 1. skilfull in hewing timber than the Iſraelites, may (as I thinke) be included. For Hiram cauſed his ſeruants to bring down the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the ſea, and
1 King. 5. 9. thence ſent them in raffes to Ioppe, or the next port to Ieruſalem. For in the ſecond of Chronicles the ſecond Chapter, it is plaine, that all but the thirtie thouſand Carpenters, and the ouer-ſeers, were ſtrangers, and as it ſeemeth, the vaſſals of Hiram, and of Vaphres
1 King. 5. 11. King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and ſtone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thouſand meaſures of wheate, and twenty meaſures of pure oyle yeerely. Euſebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the laſt Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the ſame as Huram and Hiram) King of Tyre in theſe words:

REx Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi, Amico paterno ſalutem. Scias me à Deo magno Dauid patris mei regnum accepiſſe, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, vt etiam ad te ſcriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te vt artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

KIng Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, ſendeth greeting. You may vnderſtand that I haue receiued of the great God of my father Dauid, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commanded alſo that I ſhould write to you: I write therefore to you, and beſeech you, that you would be pleaſed to ſend me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this anſwer.

SVron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia Rex, Salomoni Regi ſalutem. Lectis literis gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam ſcribis fabros miniſtroſq; ad condendum Templum eſſe tibi mittendos, miſi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur vt neceſſarijs non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

SVron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your letters, I gaue God thankes, who hath inſtalled you in your fathers Kingdome. And becauſe you write, that Carpenters and Workemen may be ſent to build Gods Temple, I haue ſent you fourſcore thouſand men, and a Maſter-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Iewiſh woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all neceſſaries be prouided for them, and when the Temple

The Copies of theſe letters were extant in Ioſephus time, as himſelfe affirmeth, and to be ſeene, ſaith he, Tam in noſtris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them ſomewhat in different termes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourſe betweene Salomon and Hiram either by meſſage or by writing, it is ſomewhat otherwiſe deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Ioſephus ſet it downe, but ſo, that in ſubſtance there is little difference
1 King. 5. from the 1. vv. to the 9. betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is ſaid to haue written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was anſwered as from Hiram.

But wheras ſome Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Euſebius, I doe not finde any ſuch addition of magnus in Euſebius in the laſt chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Ioſephus in the eight booke and ſecond chapter of the Iewes Antiquities: it being a vain title vſed by ſome of the Aſſyrian and Perſian Kings, and vſed likewiſe by the Parthians, and many other after them, inſomuch as in later times it grew common, and was vſurped by meane perſons in reſpect of the great Hermes the firſt, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightineſſe.

After the finiſhing and dedication of the Temple and houſe of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ieruſalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Ioſua's time: ſo did he Gaza of the Philiſtims: he Ioſ. ant. l. 8. c. 2. built Berothon, Gerar, & the Millo or munition of Ieruſalem. For Pharaoh (as it ſeemeth in in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place & Territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Sheshack this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it self.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desart of Iuda, or (as Iosephus thinks) Palmyra in the desart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vtmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wan Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therfore bestowed theron the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith he) giuen by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold receiued from Hirams seruants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty townes in or neere the vpper Galilee, but because they stood in an vnfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

Ioseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possest by the Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was vnder the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoeuer it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a iourney into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition he were driuen to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, & so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber & Eloth the vttermost place of the South of all his territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I haue described in the Storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pinedas conceit of two strange passages about Africke.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recouer a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written 450. talents: wherof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men; and 420. talents which makes fiue and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10.14. which speaketh of sixe hundred sixty and sixe talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerly, and which came to him besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought it) but a Countrey in the East Indies, with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies than in three yeeres; and that Tharsis in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath beene already declared in the first booke.

c. 8. §. 9. 10. & 3. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Only it remaineth that I ſhould ſpeake ſomewhat of Pineda his ſtrange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would faine haue Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteſſus, which is the Southweſt corner of that Prouince, to bee the Tharſis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reaſon, as it ſeemes, but for loue of his own countrie, and becauſe of ſome affinitie of ſound betweene Tharſis and Tarteſſus. For wheras it may ſeeme ſtrange that it ſhould be three yeeres ere they that took ſhip in the red ſea, ſhould return from the East Indies to Ieruſalem, this hath been in part anſwered already. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of ſundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages between Ieruſalem and the red ſea, and perhaps alſo elſewhere: ſo that we haue no need to make Salomons men to goe many thouſand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that ſo they might bee long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Iſraelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not haue been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran ſea, and ſo (beſides many wonderfull inconueniences, and terrible nauigation in rounding Affrica) they ſhould haue eſcaped the troubleſome land-carriage betweene Ieruſalem and the red ſea through drie, deſart, and the theeuiſh Countries: and within 30. mile of Ieruſalem at Ioppe, or ſome other hauen in Salomons owne Country, haue laden and vnladen their ſhips.

But this direct courſe they could not hold (ſaith Pineda) becauſe the huge Iſland of Atlantis in largenes greater than all Affrick and Aſia, being ſwallowed vp in the Atlantik Ocean, hindred Salomons ſhips from paſſing through the ſtraits of Gibraliar: for this hee alleageth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpaſſable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran ſea: or that this indraught where the ſea runneth moſt violently, and moſt eaſily ſcoureth his channell, ſhould be filled with mud, and not alſo the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Iland is ſuppoſed to haue ſtood: or that Salomons ſhips being in the red ſea, ſhould neglect the golden Mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red ſea, than any in Spain) to ſeeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compaſſing Affrica; it is moſt ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himſelfe that hath alſo the rich Peru in the Weſt, fortifieth in the East Indies, and inhabites ſome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in thoſe parts no leſſe quantitie of gold (the ſmall territorie which hee there poſſeſſeth conſidered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sal. l. 4 c. 11. The ſame Pineda hath another ſtrange paſſage round about all Affrica, which elſwhere he dreames of: ſuppoſing whereas Ionas ſailing to Tharſis the Citie of Cilicia, was caſt out in the Mediterran ſea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three daies ſwimming aboue twelue thouſand Engliſh miles, along the Mediterran ſeas, and ſo through the ſtreights of Gades, and along all the huge ſeas round about Affrica, caſt vp Ionas vpon the ſhore of the Red ſea, that ſo hee might haue perhaps ſome ſixe miles the ſhorter (though much the worſe) way to Niniuie. This conceit he grounds only vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red ſea (as if we ſhould call it mare algoſum, the ſea full of weeds) for the red ſea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper ſignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place againſt his own rule (which elſewhere he giueth vs) ſuppoſeth ſtrange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finiſhed in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preſeruation of Ionas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore ſeeing there is no neceſſitie of this miracle, we ſend it back vnto him, keeping his owne rule, which in this place hee forgets; Miracula non ſunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non ſunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without neceſſitie, nor deliuered without cauſe, nor fained at pleaſure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwiſe very learned and iudicious) might be thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our ſtorie of Salomon.

As it appeares he tooke a ſhip at Iapho or Ioppe. c. 1. v. 2.

Ing. P.

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (as it ſeemes, from Arabia fœlix, & not, as ſome thinke, from Ethiopia) and her rich preſents, & Salomons reciprocall magnificence, and his reſoluing of her difficult queſtions, thoſe are ſet downe at large in the Text. But herein Ioſephus is greatly miſtaken, who calls this Queen of Saba

Nicaules,

Nicaules, the ſucceſſor (ſaith hee out of Herodotus) of thoſe thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which ſucceeded Menes the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elſewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; ſo were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, aboue three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho ſlew Ioſias King of Iuda. 1. Chron. 35. v. 20. 2.

It is alſo written of Salomon, that he kept in garriſons fourteene thouſand Chariots, and twelue thouſand horſemen; that hee ſpent in Court euery day thirty meaſures of fine flower, threeſcore meaſures of wheat, one hundred ſheepe, beſides ſtags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thouſand ſtalles of horſes he had for his chariots & other vſes, & for the twelue thouſand horſemen of his guard. For, the ten thouſand ſtals in the firſt of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for ſo many horſes, whence in the ſecond of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thouſand ſtals or teemes, and in euery teeme ten horſes, as Iunius and the Geneua vnderſtand it. He was ſaid to be wiſer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrah. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Ioſephus writes them Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan the ſonnes of Hemon. He ſpake three thouſand Prouerbes, and his ſongs were one thouſand and fiue, whereof either the moſt part periſhed in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or elſe becauſe many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publike Records of Ciuill cauſes and not Eccleſiaſticall, therefore they were not thought neceſſary to bee inſerted into Gods Booke. 1. King. 4. 31.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

NOw as he had plenty of all other things, ſo had he no ſcarcitie of women. For beſides his ſeuen hundred Wiues, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people ſhould accompany the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell adoting, his Wiues turned his heart after other gods, as Aſteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoſh of Moab.

Theſe things God puniſhed by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damaſcus, and by Ieroboam his owne ſeruant, and one of the maſters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his ſonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vtitur, quæ ipſe non fecit: God in puniſhing ſinners, vſeth the ſins of others, which he himſelfe wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yeeres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and muſt therefore be found only by coniecture. The moſt likely way to gueſſe at the truth in this caſe is, by conſidering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may beſt make eſtimation of the yeeres which they conſumed, and conſequently learne the true, or moſt likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ieruſalem, and warred with the Philiſtims, who alſo troubled him in the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke ſeemes to haue been in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere enſuing, at which time hee had ſufficient leiſure, liuing in reſt. 2. King. 7. v. 1.

After this he had warres with the Philiſtims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which muſt needs haue held him fiue yeeres, conſidering that the Aramites of Damaſco raiſed warre againſt him, after ſuch time as hee had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of theſe warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that theſe ſeruices occupied any longer time, becauſe in thoſe dayes and places there were no wintering campes in vſe, but at conuenient ſeaſons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, diſpatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the ſpoyle of the enemies country, partly vpon the priuate prouiſion which euery ſouldier made for himſelfe. The 17. yeere of Dauid, in which he tooke Mephiboſeth the ſon 2. Sam. 11. v. 1. 1. Sam. 17. v. 17. & 18.

of Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to haue paſſed away in quiet; and the yeere following to haue begun the warre with Ammon; but ſomewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Ioab after the victory, returned immediately to Ieruſalem) the cauſes and preparations for that warre taking vp all the Summer. Dauids perſonall expedition againſt the Aramites wherein he brought all the tributaries of Adadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifeſtly to haue beene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of ſuccour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumæa being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it muſt haue been the 20. yeare of Dauids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which hee ſent forth Ioab to beſiege Rabba, and finiſhed the warre of Ammon: wherein alſo fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very proſperous: in the other halfe hee felt great ſorrow by the expectation, execution, and ſad remembrance of that heauie Iudgement laid vpon him by God for his foule and bloody offence.

Now very manifeſt it is, that in the yeere after the death of that child which was begottten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who muſt needs therefore haue been nineteene yeeres old or thereabout, when he began to reigne at the diceaſe of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in all fortie.

This account hath alſo good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of enſuing actions: for two yeeres paſſed ere Abſolon ſlew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings preſence. After this he prepared horſes and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which ſeemes to haue been one yeeres work. So the rebellion it ſelfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amaſa & the reſt, may well ſeeme to haue been in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine ſhould be reckoned apart from the laſt yeeres of warre with the Philiſtims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needful to coniecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the ten remaining yeeres of Dauid there was time ſufficient, and to ſpare, both for the three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the peſtilence enſuing; as alſo for his owne laſt infirmitie, and diſpoſing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it ſeemes that the warre with the Philiſtimes, was but one yeares worke, and ended in three or foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neere vnto Gezer, and the laſt at Gath. This war the Philiſtims vndertooke, as it ſeemeth, vpon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Iſrael, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age: for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwards hindered by his men from expoſing himſelfe vnto danger anie more. So Dauid had ſixe or ſeuen yeares of reſt, in which time it is likely that manie of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the ſtirring ſpirit of Adonijah found little ſuccour in the broken partie of Ioab the ſonne of Zeruia.

1 King. c. 2. v. 9. & c. 3. v. 7. At this time it might both truly be ſaid by Dauid to Salomon, Thou art a wiſe man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young childe: for nineteene yeares of age might well agree with eyther of theſe two ſpeeches.

2. Sam. 15. 7. Neuertheleſſe there are ſome that gather out of Salomons profeſsing himſelfe a child, that hee was but eleuen yeares old when hee began to reigne. Of theſe Rabbi Salomon ſeemes the firſt Author, whom other of great learning and iudgement haue herein followed: grounding themſelues perhaps vpon that which is ſaid of Abſolons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeares, which they vnderſtood as yeares of Dauids reigne. But whereas Rehoboam the ſonne of Salomon was 41. yeares old when hee began to reigne, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himſelfe but a childe of nine or ten years old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. yeares) were but eleuen yeares old when his reigne began. To auoide this inconuenience, Ioſephus allowes 80. yeares of reigne to Salomon; a report ſo diſagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion conſtrued the words of Ioſephus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by ſuch reckoning he ſhould haue beene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and conſequently ſhould haue beene borne long before his Father had wonne Ieruſalem; which is a manifeſt vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeeres remem-remembred in Absalons rebellion, may either seeme to haue reference to the space between Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which GOD brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Iosephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Absalon to Ierusalam, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

THere remaine of Salomons workes, the Prouerbs, the Preacher, and the song of Salomon. In the first he teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanitie of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Booke intituled, The wisedome of Salomon, (which some giue vnto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author therof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make vs thinke it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientiæ (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Booke of wisedome, which is ascribed to Salomon, sauoureth of the Grecian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Booke and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Booke hath a direct foretelling of the Passion of Christ in these wordes: Circumueniamus iustum, quoniam insuauis est nobis, &c. Let vs circumuent the righteous, for he is vnpleasing to vs, hee is contrary to our doings, he checketh vs for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to haue the knowledge of God, and he calleth himselfe the sonne of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Bookes of Ecclesiastes, Prouerbs, and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas & Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graued the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled downe, because the people neglecting helpe from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoueries.

Hier. ad Cromatium. Sap. 2. S. Sen. fol. 62. Reinecc. in Iul. Hist.

Of Salomons Bookes of Inuocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell euill spirits, Iosephus hath written at large, though (as I conceiue) rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring, dispossest diuers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainely so strange an example of humane frailtie hath neuer beene read of as this King: who hauing receiued wisedome from God himselfe, in honour of whom, and for his only seruice, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Iudæa, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giuer of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King than to any that euer the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house to his name, and prepare the Sanctuary for euer; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with vnderstanding, as with a flood? Thy minde couered the whole earth, and hath filled it with graue and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloued, &c. but thus hee concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to women, and wast euer come by thy body; thou didst staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath vpon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

NEere the beginning of Salomons reigne, Agesilaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soone after Syluius Alba the fourth of the Siluii, swayed those Kingdomes: Eusthenes then gouerning Assyria: Agasus & Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In

In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Baliastrus succeeded, and reigned seuenteene yeers, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Bazorius the next after Hiram; if there be not some Kings omitted betweene the death of Hiram and the reigne of Bazorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac of Shishak (as our English Geneua termes him) began to gouern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Iosephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus; Eusebius in the colume of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reproueth it as an errour in Herodotus, that hee ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I haue spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this hee was reproued, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesostris perceiuing, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddenly carried about, and became the highest, and the vpmost part was as suddenly turned down-ward, and vnder all: which when Sesostris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that hee could not bee taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatrie.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitesse, now forty yeeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Egypt, since hee fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arriuall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quàm metui; So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) bee more assured, if hee desired rather to bee beloued than feared: whereof hee tooke three daies to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that hee was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolue, so had he not the iudgement to discerne of counsels; which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that hee had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswased him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: hee was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backes of his subiects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsly of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible tearmes, to lay yet heauier, and more vnsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared in the successe, those yonger aduisers greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe; they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subiects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue been twisted and forged by loue onely? His witlesse parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Ahiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arriued, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? wee haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Isbai. Now though themselues, euen all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgat both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God; and, as all alienate resolued hearts doe, they serued themselues for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subiects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beate to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speede, and recouered Ierusalem, where preparing to inuade Israel, with an hundred and fourescore thousand chosen men, Shimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was staied for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sechem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Iordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set vp two Calues of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods which deliuered them out of Egypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua; for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboams (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophesie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the Authority of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a-sunder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandement of God, who againe recouered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceed as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forsooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith hee) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, præsentesq; vtilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituunt, tantsam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, ampliãda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iustitia honestatisq; leges subuertendæ, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasq; relinquendum censent; cuncta ruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipsos, modò id, quod è re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareue possit Deus: So they who are now called Polititians, propounding to themselues, as their vtmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and present profit; are wont to allege the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to bee regarded: for the good of the state, for aduancing, preseruing, or encreasing of the state, they thinke that they may doe any thing. If they meane to oppresse their neighbour, to ouerturne all lawes of iustice and honestie, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, bee it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may haue what they would; as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of raggioni del stato, did serue as well to vphold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatrie of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground Amazia the Priest of Bethel, counsailed the Prophet Amos, not to prophecie at Bethel; For (saith hee) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it: and behold the wretched ends that haue euer followed it; whereof Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselues very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recouer the Prouinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeauour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin: not that hee feared Ieroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not only fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Iudæa: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Salomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were reuolted, and become enemies to the Iudæans. So as by those two waies (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing, as he thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groues on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his reigne, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumæa, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments; entred Iudæa with twelue thousand Chariots, and threescore thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations: Egyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cusites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petræa, and of the desart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Iuda. The Succæans, according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodítæ, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the bankes of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about sixe hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not thinke that the Succims, or Succæi were those Troglodítæ, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomie cals Arabes Ægyptii, or, Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt between the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, far neerer Egypt, and readier to be leuied than those remoued Sauages of the Troglodítæ.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sesac inuaded Iudæa, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the soueraignty of Iudæa, and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may bee gathered out of the Word of GOD, where premising the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leaue them vnder the yoke of Egypt, in these words: Neuertheless, they (to wit, the Iudæans) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of Sesac.

After

After this ouerthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelue yeeres, and his losses receiued by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the warre against Ieroboam all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Israel foure yeeres.

Rehoboam liued 58. yeeres, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Terpippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernors for life after Codrus, gouerned in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abistrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fift of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixt) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Syluius Alba, Syluius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Syluii. Euseb. chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus king of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which vsurped the kingdome twelue yeeres.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to gouerne Assyria, the 34. king thereof: and not long after Astartus, the son of Baleastartus, recouered the kingdome of Tyre from the Vsurpers.

§. III.

Of the great battaile betweene Ieroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods iudgements.

Abiah the sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers kingdome, and his vices. Hee raised an Armie of foure hundred thousand, with which he inuaded Ieroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side fiue hundred thousand; the greatest ouerthrow that euer was giuen or receiued of those Nations. Abiah being now master of the field, recouered Bethel, Iesbanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abiah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the second of Chronicles: he reigned but three yeeres, & then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were. 2. Chron. 16. 2.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, therby the better to assure his estate, which while he serued God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring kings; & when he forsooke him, it was torne asunder by his meanest Vassals: Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac; For the son Abiah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, & with the same number hee ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fiue hundred thousand; God giuing spirit, courage, and inuention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liueth and gouerneth all things for euer, doth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set downe, that they might be as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudy house, &c. And Dauid 2. Sam. 21. 1. towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelue torne from his son for his Idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe and his posterity, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sons slaine by the Philistims, and his very bowels torne out of his body by an excoriating flixe, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Iezebel were slaine, the bloud of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like ſtirres in all after-times, and in theſe our dayes by the ſame famine, plagues, warre, loſſe, vexation, death, ſickneſſe, and calamities; howſoeuer the wiſe men of the world raiſe theſe effects no higher than to ſecond cauſes, and ſuch other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, ſeeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

§. IIII.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

2. Chron. 14. TO Abijah ſucceeded Asa, who enioyed peace for his firſt ten yeeres, in which time he eſtabliſhed the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to ſtrange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee alſo ſpared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatreſſe, 2. Chron. 15. 16. but depoſing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, ſtampt it, and burnt it. Hee alſo fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings do) for the troubles of warre in the leaſure of peace. For not long after he was inuaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Iudæa, and with ſuch a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I haue read) were neuer aſſembled of that Nation, either before or ſince. For it is written, that there came againſt the Iudæans, 2. Chron. 14. 9. Zerah of Æthiopia, with an hoſte of ten hundred thouſand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountred with an Armie of fiue hundred and foureſcore thouſand, leuied out of thoſe two Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the ſpoyle both of their Cities and Campes.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I haue * proued already, and were it but the length betweene Æthiopia and Iudæa, and the ſtrong flouriſhing Regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not ſuffer a million of ſtrangers to paſs through them) it were ſufficient to make it appeare how fooliſh the opinion is, that theſe inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, & the cities thereabouts were ſpoiled by the Iudæans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar ſtandeth vpon the torrent of Beſor, which Dauid paſt ouer when he ſurprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proueth ſufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, & that Gerar was a frontier town ſtanding on the vttermoſt South-border of all Iudæa, from all parts of Æthiopia ſixe hundred miles. Alſo the ſpoiles which Asa tooke, as the cattell, camels, and ſheepe, whereof he ſacrificed fiue thouſand, ſhew them to be Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknown Æthiopians. And if it be obiected that theſe deſart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I anſwer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Deſart which compaſſe two parts of the holy Land, ſhould yeeld ten hundred thouſand, as that two Tribes of the twelue, ſhould arme fiue hundred and foureſcore thouſand. Beſides, it anſwereth to the promiſe of God to Abraham, that theſe Nations ſhould exceede in number; for God ſpake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that hee ſhould beget twelue Princes, &c.

* In the former booke. c. 4. §. 14. item c. 8. §. 10. * 6.

2. Chron. 14.

Baaſha a king of Iſrael began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of 2. Chro. 16. v. 1. Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad king of Syria, of the race of Hadezer, to ioyne with him againſt Asa; and to the end to block him vp, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ieruſalem towards Samaria.

This warre began accotding to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of Asa his reigne: but becauſe in the firſt of Kings the 16. it is ſaid that Baaſha died in the 26. yeer of Asa; therfore could not Baaſha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reign, but in the 35. yeer of the diuiſion of Iuda and Iſrael; for ſo many yeers it was from the firſt of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeers, to the 16. of Asa. It may ſeeme ſtrange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of fiue hundred & foureſcore thouſand good Souldiers, did not eaſily driue away Baaſha, and defeat him of his purpoſes; the victories of Abia againſt Ieroboam, and of Asa himſelfe againſt Zerah, being yet freſh in minde, which might well haue emboldened the men of Iuda, and aſmuch diſheartened the enemies. Queſtionleſſe there were ſome important Circumſtances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late seruice against Zerah, had caused many mens priuate businesses to lye vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentiue to the culture of their lands & other trades, might be vnwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconuenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might haue deterred Asa from aduenturing himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the successe into the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose emploiments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inuasion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselues masters of that kingdome. So Benhadad being now ented into Nepthalim, without resistance, hee spoyled diuers principall Cities thereof, & inforced Baasha to quit Rama, & to leaue the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loued neither party, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Iuda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relyed on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppresse his people, and was therefore strooken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two yeeres continually tormented, he gaue vp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

Euseb. in Chron.

§. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reigne of Asa.

IN the reigne of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegeance to the house of Dauid, if the wisedome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance laid vpon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diuision of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reigne ouer the ten Tribes. One son Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the fauourable approbation of God himselfe.

After the losse of this good son, the vngodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankefulnesse to God, that he durst not suffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea of Gods extreame hatred, yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisdome, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Ieroboam, reigned in the second and third yeeres of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeer of two and twenty did run along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Baasha, so that perhaps this Nadab enioyed not his Kingdome one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence: It seemes that hee little feared the iudgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, & besieged one of their Townes. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to mind their grieuous losse of fiue hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slaine he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for king in his stead: Baasha was no sooner proclaimed king, than hee began to take order with the house of Ieroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for priuate respects, & not in regard of Gods will to haue it so, it is euident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Ieroboam had begun. Wherefore he receiued the same sentence from God that had been laid vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same sort. He began to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diuerted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Country, destroying all the Land of Nepthalim. Foure and twenty yeeres hee reigned, and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his son; who enioyed it, as Nadab the son of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres currant, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Ieroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting & drinking with his Minions, whereby he gaue such aduantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the king at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, & his behauiour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set vpon Ela in his drunkennesse, and slew him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himselfe king of Israel: and began his reigne with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselues before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to haue forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to ashes. Seuen dayes he is said to haue reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, walking in the way of Ieroboam; & therfore is likely to haue had more time wherein to declare himselfe, than the reigne of seuen dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to haue defended his own life. 1. King. 16. 19.
After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtlesse would neuer haue appeared, if there had not beene ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not finde; onely it appeares that his side was decayed, and so he died, leauing no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A coniecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Iuda, which might haue beene effected by these troubles.

ANy man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may iustly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered vnder these vnfortunate Princes, and with the present ciuill warres, did not returne to their ancient kings, and re-unite themselues with the mighty Tribes of Iuda and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man forsaken; than to haue recourse vnto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the the cauſe of all things) vnleſſe it could be proued, that he had forbidden Aſa to deale in that buſineſſe, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the reſtraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the ſuppreſſion of that preſent inſurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Iſrael & Iuda, ſo many yeeres following: whereín Abia ſo farre preuailed, that he wan a great battaile, and recouered ſome Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his own Dominion. Wherfore we may boldly look into the ſecond cauſes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to ſuffer any thing vnder new vpſtarts, rather than to caſt their eyes vpon that Royall houſe of Dauid, from which the ſucceſſion of fiue kings in lineall deſcent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly haue beene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof. To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors in making peace with Aſa, were a coniecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an adolater, but did worſe than all that were before him; which as it might ſerue alone to proue, that Aſa, being a godly king, would not adhere to him, ſo the courſe which he profeſſed to take at the very firſt, of reuenging the maſſacre committed vpon the family and friends of Baaſha, (Aſa his mortall enemy) giues manifeſt reaſon, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, ſhould more iuſtly than he haue expected the friendſhip of Iuda in that quarrel. Wherfore, in ſearching out the reaſon of this backwardnes in the ten Tribes (which was ſuch, that they may ſeeme to haue neuer thought vpon the matter) to ſubmit themſelues to their true Princes; it were not amiſs to examine the cauſes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the ſon of Ieroboam, who followed the wars in perſon, as a man of ſpirit & courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very firſt defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we looke vpon humane reaſon) occaſioned by deſire of breaking that heauie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their deſire was to haue a king that ſhould not oppreſſe them; not to haue no king at all. And therfore when the arrogant follie of Rehoboam had cauſed them to renounce him, they did immediatly chooſe Ieroboam in his ſtead, as a man likely to afford that liberty vnto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it ſeemes) herein altogether deceiued. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towes, & in the inſtitution of his new deuiſed idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile ſó far as to Ieruſalem. But whether it were ſo, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to ceaſe, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reigne of his ſon, when long time of poſſeſſion had confirmed his title, which at the firſt was onely good by courteſie of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in ſuch caſes) were more offended by ſome prerogatiues of a king, that he ſtill retained in his owne hands, than pleaſed with his remiſſion of other burdens: it is cleerly apparant, that the whole army of all Iſrael ioined with Baaſha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams houſe.

1. King. 16. 25.

Now the reign of Baaſha himſelfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and coſt at Rama was caſt away; the other ſide of his kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philiſtims, but left that buſineſſe to his ſon, who likewiſe appeares an vnprofitable ſluggard. Wherefore it muſt needs be, that the fauour of the people toward the houſe of Baaſha grew from his good forme of Ciuill gouernment, which happely he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam euer meant to doe. And ſurely hee that ſhall take pains to looke into thoſe examples, which are extant of the different courſes, held by the kings of Iſrael & Iuda, in adminiſtration of iuſtice, will finde it moſt probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued ſo auerſe from the line of Dauid; as to thinke all aduerſitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that houſe. For the death of Ioab and Shimei was indeede by them deſerued; yet in that they ſuffered it without forme of iudgement, they ſuffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without iudgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the kings iealouſie: out of which by the ſame rule of arbitrary iuſtice (vnder which it may be ſuppoſed that many were caſt away) hee would haue ſlaine Ieroboam (if hee could haue caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appeares by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to haue endured wrong, hauing not offered anie.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Iehoram did vpon his brethren, & vpon ſundry of his greateſt men; as alſo Ioaſh did ſo put to death Zachariah the ſon of Iehoiada, who had made him king, euen in the court of the houſe of the Lord: and Manaſſes did ſhed innocent bloud exceeding much, till hee repleniſhed Ieruſalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; beſides his ſinne, wherewith he made Iuda to ſinne. Contrariwiſe, among the kings of Iſrael we finde no monument of ſuch arbitrary proceeding, vnleſſe perhaps the words of Iehoram the ſonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for arrinſtance, when he ſaid, God doe ſo to mee, and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha the ſonne of Shaphat ſhall ſtand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to haue him condemned as a falſe Prophet, that had made them hold out againſt the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children; which he thought a ſufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpoſe to deliuer them. The death of Naboth ſheweth rather the liberty which the Iſraelites enioyed, than any peremptory execution of the kings will. For Naboth did not feare to ſtand vpon his owne right, though Ahab were euen ſicke for anger; neither was he for that cauſe put to death, as vpon commandement, but made away by conſpiracie, the matter being handled after a iudiciall forme, which might giue ſatisfaction to the people, ignorant of the deuice, though to God it could not.

2 King. 21. 16.
2. King. 6. 31.

The murther of the Prophet is continually aſcribed to Iezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the king her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their liues were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being idolaters, were both pleaſed with their death, & laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of Iuda (ſuch as are regiſtred) proue them to vſe a more abſolute maner of command, than the kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their ſufferings witneſſe the contrary. For of thoſe which reigned ouer Iuda, from the diuiſion of the kingdome, to the captiuity of the ten Tribes, three were ſlaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongſt their anceſtors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, ſlaine by Iehu, with the deſtruction of all that Royall ſeed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) ſtirre vp in the people any ſuch thirſt of reuenge, as might by the ſuddenneſſe and vniformity teſtifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes: vnleſſe we ſhould thinke that the death of Athalia, after ſeuen yeeres reigne, were occaſioned rather by the memory of her ill purchaſing, than by the preſent ſenſe of her tyrannicall abuſing the gouernment, whereon ſhe had ſeiſed. On the other ſide, ſuch of the kings of Iſrael as periſhed by treaſon (which were ſeuen of the twenty) were all ſlaine by conſpiracie of the great men, who aſpired by treaſon to the Crowne: the people being ſo far from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soueraignes, that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbeare to reuenge the death of their kings, when it lay in their power; nor approue the good ſucceſſe of treaſon, vnleſſe feare compelled them. So that the death of two kings, being throughly reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterouſly got and vſurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the ſeuen remain, whoſe ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is preciſely ſaid of the ſlaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durſt not fight with him that did it, becauſe they were exceedingly affraid: and the ſame feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whoſe hiſtory (as others of that time) is curſorily paſſed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more abſolutely, of the kings of England, that neuer any of them periſhed by fury of the people, but by treaſon of ſuch as did ſucceed them; neither was there any motiue vrging ſo forcibly the death of king Edward and king Richard when they were in priſon, as feare leſt the people ſhould ſtirre in their quarrell. And certainely (howſoeuer all that the Law cals treaſon, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the kings deſtruction) in thoſe treaſonable inſurrections of the vulgar, which haue here moſt preuailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it ſelfe with the bloud of ſome great Officers; no ſuch rebellions, howſoeuer wicked and barbarous otherwiſe, thirſting after the ruine of their naturall Soueraigne, but rather forbearing the aduantages gotten vpon his Royall perſon: which if any man impute vnto groſſe ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, aſcribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who

2. King. 19. 10.

2. King. 10. 4.

who, being dooſened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands giue aſſiſtance to Iupiter, when all the reſt of the gods conſpired againſt him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as ſignifying that Monarches need not to feare any curbing of their abſolutenes by mighty ſubiects, as long as by wiſedome they keep the hearts of the people; who will be ſure to come in on their ſide. Though indeed the Storie might very well haue borne the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tells vs that Pallas was one of the conſpiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment ſufficeth by it ſelfe to retaine the people, not onely without aſſiſtance of a laborious Wit, but euen againſt all deuices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt Politicians: euery Sheriffe and Conſtable, being ſooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebell, how mighty ſoeuer, can againſt him.

This declaration of the peoples loue, being ſeldome found in Iuda, makes it very likely, that the rule it ſelfe of gouernment there was ſuch, as neither gaue occaſion of contentment vnto the ſubiects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the kings. Vpon which reaſons it may ſeem that the multitude was kept vſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would haue beene almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the ſiſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the royall bloud of Iuda, ſhould by the onely authority of a Queene-mother haue deſtroyed all the ſeed of Dauid, and vſurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any reſiſtance. Yea when Iehoiada the high Prieſt had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to ſet vp Ioaſh their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to giue to theſe Captaines and their men, the ſpeares and the ſhields that were King Dauids, and were in the houſe of the Lord. But we need not enter into ſuch particulars. Queſtionleſſe, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admiſſion, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reaſon, why the ten Tribes did neuer ſeek to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſixe firſt Kings, which died in the reigne of Aſa, admitted a ſeuenth of a new family, rather than they would conſubiect themſelues, with thoſe of Iuda and Beniamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heauie yoke.

So Aſa hauing ſeen the death of 7. kings of Iſrael, died himſelfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leauing Iehoſaphat his ſonne to deale with Ahab the ſonne of Omri, who was the eighth King ouer the ten Tribes.

Of Iehoſaphat and his contemporaries.

Iehoſaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a Prince religious and happy; hee deſtroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatry, and ſent teachers to all places and people wanting inſtruction; he recouered the tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philiſtims: from the one he had ſiluer, from the other ſheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thouſand and foure hnndred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thouſand, Iehohanam of two hundred and foureſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that he had, beſides theſe, in Beniamin of thoſe that bare ſhields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers vnder Eliada, two hundred thouſand, and vnder the commandement of Iehozabad a hundred and foureſcore thouſand: which numbred together, make eleuen hundred and ſixty thouſand, all which are ſaid to haue waited vpon the King beſides his gariſons. 2. Chron. 17.

That Iuda & Beniamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, ſhould muſter eleuen hundred and ſixtie thouſand fighting men, it is very ſtrange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Ioab in Dauids time found fiue hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and foureſcore thouſand: Abia foure hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa fiue hundred and foureſcore thouſand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, & they amounted to three hundred thouſand. Sure- 2. Sam. 24. 9.

ly,

ly, whereas it is written that when news was brought to Iehoſaphat that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the Weſt of Iordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that he would haue feared euen the army of Xerxes, if hee could haue brought into the field 1. hundred and 60. thouſand fighting men, leauing all his ſtrong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my ſelfe to better iudgement) that theſe numbers ſpecified in the ſecond of Chronicles the 17. diſtributed to ſeuerall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thouſand vnder Adnah, and the 200. and foureſcore thouſand vnder Iehohanam, were afterward commanded and muſtered by Amaſiah, Eliada, and Iehoſabad: for the groſſe and totall is not in that place ſet downe, as it was vnder the other kings formerly named. Againe, as the aydes which Iehoſaphat brought to Ahab did not ſhew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, ſo the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could neuer make the one halfe of thoſe numbers, which he that commanded leaſt among Iehoſaphats Leaders had vnder him.

This mighty Prince notwithſtanding his greatneſſe, yet he ioyned in friendſhip with Ahab king of Iſrael, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iehoſaphat viſited at Samaria, and cauſed his ſon Ioram to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perſwaded Ioſaphat to aſſiſt him in the Warre againſt the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the ſucceſſe: who promiſed him victory. But Iehoſaphat beleeued nothing at all in thoſe diuiners, but reſolued firſt of all to conferre with ſome one Prophet of the Lord God of Iſrael. Hereupon Achab made anſwer that hee had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, becauſe hee alwayes foretold of euill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was ſent for to the king; but by the way the meſſenger prayed him to conſent with the reſt of the Prophets, and to promiſe victory vnto them as they did. But Michaiah ſpake the truth, and repeated his viſion to both the kings, which was, that God asked who ſhall perſwade Ahab, that hee may goe vp and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a ſpirit that ſtood before the Lord anſwered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, and be in them a falſe ſpirit to delude. For as it is ſaid by Chriſt: Non enim vos eſtis qui loquimini, ſed ſpiritus patris veſtri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that ſpake, but the Spirit of your Father ſpeakes in you: ſo in a contrary kinde did the deuill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his deſtruction. And as P. Martyr vpon this place well obſerueth, theſe euill ſpirits are miniſters of Gods vengeance, & are vſed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes ſometime imploy. For as it pleaſeth God by his good Angels, to ſaue & deliuer from deſtruction, of which the Scriptures haue many examples: ſo on the contrary, it is by the euill that hee puniſheth and deſtroyeth; both which are ſaid to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Eccleſiaſticus remembreth a ſecond ſort of malignant natures, but they are euery-where viſible. There are ſpirits, ſaith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on ſure ſtroakes. In the time of deſtruction they ſhew forth their power, and accompliſh the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias hauing by this his reuelation greatly diſpleaſed the King, and the Prophets whoſe ſpirit he diſcouered, was ſtroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Achab himſelfe committed to priſon: where he appointed him to be reſerued and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, anſwered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not ſpoken by mee. Neuertheleſſe Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Iehoſaphat returned to Ieruſalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for aſſiſting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God. 2. Chron. 18.

After this the Aramites or Damaſcens, ioined with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idumæans to inuade Iudæa: who paſſe Iordan & encamp at Engaddi; & when Iehoſaphat gathered his army, the prophet Iahaziel foretold him of the victory, which ſhould be obtained without any bloud-ſhed of his part: & ſo when Iehoſaphat approached, this aſſembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, diſagreeing with the Idumæans, & quarrelling for ſome cauſes among themſelues, thoſe of Ammon & Moab ſet vpon the Idumæans, & brake them vtterly; which done, they alſo inuaded each other; in which broile Iehoſaphat arriuing took the ſpoile of them all without any loſs of his part, as it was foretold & promiſed 2. Chro. 20.

miſed by God. Notwithſtanding this victory, Iehoſaphat forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for aſſiſting an Idolatrous king, did notwithſtanding ioyn with Ochazias, the ſon of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to ſend to Ophir; hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eliezer the Prophet foretold him, his ſhips periſhed, & were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and ſo that enterprize was ouerthrowne. 2. Chron. 20.

Yet he taketh part with Iehoram the brother of Ochazias, againſt the Moabites, with which kings of Iuda & Iſrael the Edomites ioyne their forces, not forgetting, it ſeemes, that the Moabites aſſiſted by the Ammonites, had not long before deſtroied their army.

The Moabites, ſubiects to Dauid & Salomon, forſaking the kings of Iuda, gaue themſelues for vaſſals to Ieroboam, & ſo they continued to his ſucceſſors till the death of Achab: but Iehoſaphat, notwithſtanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it ſeemeth, he was drawne into this war both to be auenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Iſrael, as alſo becauſe they had lately ioined themſelues with the Syrians againſt Ioſaphat, & thirdly, to puniſh their double rebellion who firſt forſook Iuda & now Iſrael.

Both kings reſolued to paſſe by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to aſſure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon & Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi againſt Iehoſaphat: But whether they had then declared themſelues againſt Iehoſaphat, it is not certaine; for in the 2. of Chron. 11 verſ. 8. it is written that in the time of Ieboram the ſon of Iehoſaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it ſeemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were ſlain by Moab & Ammon, not finding themſelues ſatisfied in ſuch conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, & to ioyne themſelues with the army of Iuda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Iehoſaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a king, till Iehoſaphats death. Now in the paſſage of theſe kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the yeer, or whether the Idumæans hauing a purpoſe to rebell, miſled the army of Iuda & Iſrael, with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they ſuffered the ſame, if not a greater thirſt than the armies of Craſſus & M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood vtterly periſhed, had not Eliſha taught them to cut trenches wherinto the water ſprang, by which not only Iehoſaphat and his army, but Iehoram king of Iſrael an Idolator was relieued: the great mercy & goodnes of God hauing euer been prone to ſaue the euill for the good, whereas he neuer deſtroyed the good for the euill.

The miſerable iſſue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his ſon, or the ſon of the king of Edom, for ſacrifice on the rampire of his owne Citie, I haue already written in the life of Ieboram among the kings of Iſrael. Iehoſaphat reigned 25. yeeres and died; hee was buried in the valley of Iehoſaphat, and a part of the Pyramis ſet ouer his graue is yet to be ſeen, ſaith Brochard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the ſon of Hanani. 2. King. 3. 2. Chron. 20. Brochard. in ſanct.

There liued with Iehoſaphat, Ophraeones in Aſſyria, Capetus & Tiberinus kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the riuer Tiber (formerly Albula) tooke name.

In Iehoſaphats time alſo ruled Mecades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Ageſilaus in Corinth; and Archilaus of the ſame race, of the Heraclidæ the ſeuenth in Lacedæmon. Badeſorus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Iehoram the Iſraelites.

Chap. XX.

Of Iehoram the ſonne of Iehoſaphat and Ahazia.

§. I.

That Iehoram was made king ſundry times.

Eboram the ſon of Iehoſaphat king of Iuda began to reigne at thirty two yeeres of age, and liued vntill he was forty yeeres old, being eight yeeres a king: but of theſe eight yeeres, which Iehoram is ſaid to haue reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Iehoram king in his ſtead, as Ahab did his ſon Ahazia. This appeares by the ſeuerall beginnings, which are giuen in Scripture to the two Iehoram kings of Iſrael and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldeſt ſon of Ahab. For Ahazia is 1. Kin. 22. v. 51.

said to haue begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeer of Iehosaphat. Iehoram the brother
2. King. 1. 17. of Ahazia succeeded him in the second yeer of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat king of Iuda; that is, in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was designed king by his father;
2. King. 3. v. 1. and 9. it being (as we finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeer of Iehosaphat himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Hereby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Iehosaphat, who gouerned absolutely by himselfe, not
2. King. 8. 16. communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth yeere of Iehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the old king took vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. yeeres old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Iehosaphat reigned 25. yeeres, it is euident that his sonne
2. Kin. 22. 42. did not reigne alone till the eighth of Ioram king of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other kings of Iuda & Israel, who did not alwaies reign precisely so long as the bare letter of the text may seem at first to affirme: but their yeeres were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the yeeres of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needful than curious, to enquire into the reasons mouing Iehosaphat either to assume vnto him his son as partner in the kingdome, whilest hee was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or hauing once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to resume it vnto himselfe, or at leastwise to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill foure or fiue yeers were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discouer the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approue.

We are therfore to consider, that this king Iehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that euer entred into any streight league with the kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Iuda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselues in vaine, making small profit of the greatest aduantages that could be wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensiue & defensiue betweene Israel and Iuda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

2. Chro. 19. v. 2. and 3. This confederacy made by a religious king, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountaine of all wisedome: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdoms, against the vncircumcised nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable a iewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri, and sister of Ahab king of Israel, giuen in marriage to Iehoram, who was son and heire apparant to the king of Iuda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Iezabel her brothers wife, that she durst vndertake, & could throughly performe a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Iuda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisedome, regardlesse of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Iuda & Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victory should haue redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldome thriue by matching with Idolators, but rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself, cannot be well affected to his seruants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed, as king, his son Ahaziah, not so much perhaps in regard of the vncertaine euents of war (for none of his predecessors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micheia (for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

§. II. Pro-

§. II.

Probable coniectures of the motiues inducing the old King Iehoſaphat to change his purpoſe often, in making his ſonne Iehoram King.

MAny arguments do very ſtrongly proue Iehoram to haue been wholly ouer-ruled by his wife; eſpecially for his forſaking the religion of his godly Anceſtors, and following the abominable ſuperſtitions of the houſe of Achab.

That ſhe was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to liue a priuate life, the whole courſe of her actions witneſſeth at large. Much vaine matter ſhe was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy perſons in compariſon of him, & of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and ſiſter of two great Kings, not vpon baſe women & meere ſubiects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained againſt the Syrian Benhadad, were matter ſufficient to make an inſolent man think highly of himſelfe, as being allied ſo honourably; who could otherwiſe haue found in his heart well enough, to deſpiſe all his brethren, as being the eldeſt, and heire apparant to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a maner, the poſſeſſion.

How ſoone his vices brake out, or how long he diſſembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that ſome ſmoke, out of the hidden fire, did very ſoone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon cauſed the yongue man to know himſelfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his yonguer brethren. And ſurely the doings of Iehoſaphat about the ſame time, argue no ſmall diſtemper of the whole country, through the miſgouernment of his vngodly ſon. For the good king was fain to make his progreſſe round about the Land, reclaiming the people vnto the ſeruice of God, and appointing Iudges throughout all the ſtrong Cities of Iuda Citie by Citie. This had beene a needleſſe labour, if the religion taught and ſtrongly maintained by Aſa, and by himſelfe, had not ſuffered alteration, & the courſe of Iuſtice beene peruerted, by the power of ſuch as had borne authority. But the neceſſitie that then was of it's formation, appears by the charge which the King did giue to the Iudges, and by his commiſſion giuen to one of the Prieſts in ſpirituall cauſes, & to the Steward of his houſe in temporall matters, to be generall ouer-ſeers. 2. Chron. 19. v. 4. &c.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the ſon of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertain. For Iehoram the brother of Ahazia began his raign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Iehoſaphat, which was then accounted the ſecond of Iehoram, Iehoſaphats ſonne; though afterward this Iehoram of Iuda had another firſt and ſecond yeere, euen in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the beſt Chronologers and Expoſitors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in priuate eſtate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occaſions inducing his reſtitution to former dignity are not ſet downe, yet we may not thinke, that motiues thereto, appearing ſubſtantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Iſrael held the ſame correſpondency with Iehoſaphat that his father had done; & made vſe of it. He drew the Iudæan into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the yongue Prince of Iuda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had beene. Or if wee ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize againſt Moab did not occupy ſo much time, as from the eighteenth of Iehoſaphat, in which yeere that Nation rebelled againſt Iſrael, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations beeween the two kings of Iuda and Iſrael, and the affinity between them contracted in the perſon of Iehoram, might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behauiour of the yonguer ſons, in their elder brothers diſgrace, might cauſe their Father to put him in poſſeſſion for feare of tumult after his death; or the deep diſſimulation of Iehoram himſelfe might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing vſuall in miſchieuous fell natures, to be as abiect & ſeruile in time of aduerſity, as inſolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, he demeaned himſelf in ſuch wiſe toward his brethren, as cauſed their father to enable them, not onely with ſtore of ſiluer and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other kings doubtleſſe had vſed vnto their yonguer ſons) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong Cities in Iuda, to aſſure them, if it might haue beene, by vnwonted means, againſt vnwonted perils. 2. Chron. 21. 3.

§. III. The

§. III.

The doings of Iehoram when he raigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BVt all this prouidence auailed nothing; for an higher prouidence had otherwise determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger sonnes of Iehosaphat found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him vnto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of a king their brother, then had he them without any more adoo; if they stood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, & so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish kingdome against them; so that the apparant likelihood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoeuer it was, they were all taken and slaine, and with them for company many great men of the Land; such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their liues, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Iehoram was deposed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe iustice, could hardly auoide the doing of many things, derogatory to their yong Master; which if he would now call treason, saying that hee was then king, who durst say the contrary?

After this Iehoram took vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and safe conduct vnto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, hauing such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that aboue all other sinnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to haue set vp Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and hauing hitherto, since Dauids time, beene gouerned by a vice-Roy, did now make vnto themselues a king. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should haue subdued, and kept his seruants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherin he foretold, that Esau in processe of time should breake the yoke of Iacob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the kings of Iuda, but held their owne so well, that when, after many ciuill and forraine wars, the Iewes by sundry Nations had beene brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Iewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, & reigned as Kings, euen in Ierusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Iuda, which in the time of Iosua had a peculiar king, to rebell against Ioram, and set it selfe at liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Beniamin & of Dan farre from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therfore so vnlikely it was to haue maintained it selfe in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to haue beene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Iuda, that he would not haue accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we reade that it sought how to cast it selfe into a new subiection, but continued a free estate. The rebellion of it against Ioram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to haue not onely been the first and remote cause, but euen the next and immediate reason, moouing the inhabitants to doe as they did: for it was a Town of the Leuites, who must needs be driuen into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the king, but compulsiue authority to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which, being deuout men, they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten reuolted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainement: vnder Idolaters they must haue bin without it, whether they liued free or in subiection. Yet it seemes that priuate reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than suffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Iehoshaphat reformed his kingdome, the good old king appointing new Gouernours, and giuing them especiall charge to doe iustice without respect of persons, vsed these words, The Leuites shall bee Officers before you; Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall bee with the good. By these phrases it seemes, that he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his son; whom if the Leuites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that hee meant to be euen with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the land had done, his heauie indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may iustly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iehoshaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to haue ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it vnder the earth, which they might well in one moneth haue cast into it with shouels, by ordinary approaches.

But it seemes that of those great numbers which his Father could haue leuied, there were not many whom Ieroboam could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier losse, to let one Town goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to bee feared, than to be loued; are faine themselues to stand in feare of those, by whom they might haue beene dreadfull vnto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling vpon Iehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecy in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wiues, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appeares that he was a cruell Persecutor of Gods seruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reproue him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and euill kings; but were faine to denounce Gods iudgements against him by letters, keeping themselues close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to haue been sent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, euen in the daies of Iehoshaphat. Wherfore it may be that Elias left this prophesie in writing behind him, or that (as some coniecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be beleeued than the Tradition held by some of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heauen did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heauen to S. Giles.

2. Chron. 21. 12.

2. Kin. 2. & 3. 11.

But whosoeuer was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Iudea, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wiues; all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of Dauid, to make any offensiue warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselues in the rest of their small Territories, by defensiue armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to haue bin then as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their countrie affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoyle in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must bee considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the prouiſions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one ſubdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in purſuing their conqueſt, and going on into Regions far remoued from them. At this day hauing loſt in effect all that they had gotten, ſuch of them as liue in Arabia it ſelf are good horſemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous paſſengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding ſtarke naked, and rather truſting in the ſwifteneſſe of their horſes, than in any other meanes of reſiſtance, where they are well opposed. And ſuch, or little better, may they ſeeme to haue been, that ſpoyled Iudæa in the time of Iehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies barren and deſert, wanting manuall Arts whereby to ſupply the naturals with furniture: neither are theſe bands named as chief in that action, but rather adherents of the Philiſtims. Out of this we may infer, that one halfe, yea, or one quarter of the numbers found in the leaſt muſter of Iuda and Beniamin vnder Iehoſaphat (wherin were inrolled three hundred and eighty thouſand fighting men) had beene enough to haue driuen away far greater forces than theſe enemies are likely to haue brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes iealouſie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philiſtims.

It may ſeeme that the houſe of the King which theſe inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ieruſalem, but rather ſome other houſe of his abroad in the Country, where his wiues and children at that time lay for their recreation: becauſe we reade not that they did ſacke the City, or ſpoyle the Temple, which would haue inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got poſſeſſion thereof. Yet perhaps they took Ieruſalem it ſelfe by ſurprize, the people being diſarmed, and the Kings guards too weake to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, becauſe it was ſo large and populous: and therefore hauing done what ſpoyle they could, with-drew themſelues with ſuch purchaſe as they were able ſafely to conueigh away.

The ſlaughter committed by Iehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elſewhere) ſo many of his brothers ſons, and the cruell maſſacre wherein all the Royall ſeede periſhed (onely Ioas excepted) vnder the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this inuaſion of the Philiſtims, and Arabians, make it ſeeme probable, that the ſonnes of Iehoram were not all ſlaine at once, but that rather the firſt murther beganne in his owne time, and was ſeconded by many other heauie blowes, wherewith his houſe was inceſſantly ſtriken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After theſe calamities, the hand of God was extended againſt the body of this wicked King, ſmiting him with a grieuous diſeaſe, in his bowels, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched ſoule departed from his miſerable carcaſſe. The people of the Land, as they had ſmall cauſe of comfort in his life, ſo had they not the good manners to pretend ſorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Anceſtors the Kings of Iuda, though his owne ſonne ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the ſame ſpirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatneſſe, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne ſuch Counſellours of the houſe of Ahab, as were fitteſt for her turne. Wherefore ſhee thought it vnſeaſonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a ſtately funerall of a man by them deteſted: but rather choſe to let the blame of things paſſed be laid vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her ſelfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Inſtigators, hauing made greedy vſe of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults alſo, the man whoſe euil inclinations their ſiniſter counſailes haue made worſe, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Iehoram fel out indeed in a buſie time; when his friend & couſin the Iſraelite, who had the ſame name, was entangled in a difficult warre againſt the Aramite; and therfore could haue had no better leaſure to help Athalia, in ſetting of things according to her owne minde, than hee had (perhaps through the ſame hinderance) to helpe her husband, when hee was diſtreſſed by the Philiſtims. Yea rather hee needed and craued the aſſiſtance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I haue thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide mee by their directions) to the end that it might more plainely appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reuealed will of God, accomplish neuertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselues in the seeming-wise deuices of their owne folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their iudgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his cōmandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisedome dictateth vnto them. For in such kind of vnhappie subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear in that which immediately followeth.

§. V.

Of the reigne of Ahazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Ochazias, or Ahazia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his reigne ouer Iuda in the twelfth yeere of Iehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twenty yeeres old in the beginning of his Kingdome; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe giue him two yeeres more. Like enough he is to haue beene yongue: for he was gouerned by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile, by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise vp-held the league made with the house of Ahab. Hee was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. Hee accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to aduenture his owne person, which scaped not vnwounded.

The Towne being won was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, Iehoram king of Israel with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Ierusalem. It seemes that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scantly one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken vp a great part,) when he did make a new iourney, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would haue hindered, and therefore sought euery occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke so to leaue his kingdome, hauing no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certaine it is, that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heauie iudgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he desposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to haue been accidentall; but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will shortly bee needfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Family was destroyed by Iehu.

THE whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were sitting together; who calling out among them Iehu a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him king ouer Israel, rehearsing vnto him the Prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know the errand, which Iehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but vsed the first heat of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might be carried to Izreel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Ieboram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so wel, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuenty Princes of the bloud Royall there were that liued in Samaria; Ieboram the sonne of Queen Iezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Iuda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the Prophecie of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an vnlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the Court wherein so great a friend as the King of Iuda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the middest of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels & enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already atchieued, and the Queene-Mother dressing her selfe in the braueſt manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discouered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as he might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the king to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Ieboram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, bee discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherfore the king that was loth to discouer any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia king of Iuda in his company, company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had beene more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Ioram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, & threw his carkasse into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the right-full owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the vniust possessour. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eies behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when she least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at least to vtter some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she besmeared her eies, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith shee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, & looking out vpon him, began to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexe him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side, and soone found them ready to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own seruants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemie sate on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body vnder foot. Her dead carcasse that was left without the walls, was deuoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia king of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked, & receiuing his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

When he had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the Prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to performe it.

Iehu, who had vpon the sudden this great honour throwne vpon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but vsed the first heat of their affections who ioyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerely concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the reuolt might be carried to Izreel, whereby the King might haue had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Iehoram was now so well recouered of his wounds, that hee could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasting, and ioy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her state so wel, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certaine it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seuenty Princes of the bloud Royall there were that liued in Samaria; Iehoram the sonne of Queen Iezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with losse of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he receiued wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Iuda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leauing no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the Prophecie of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an vnlikely tale by them that beheld the maiestical face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Iuda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the middest of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels & enemies: or else were triumphing in ioy of that which was already atchieued, and the Queene-Mother dressing her selfe in the braueſt manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discouered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged vpon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to giue the King as little warning as he might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the king to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Iehu. These dumbe shewes bred some suspicion in Iehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the company drew so neere, that they might, though not perfectly, bee discerned, and notice taken of Iehu himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherfore the king that was loth to discouer any weakenesse, caused his Chariot to bee made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia king of Iuda in his company, company, whose presence added maiestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had beene more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Iehu was come euen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehoram began to salute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiuing a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to haue fled. But Iehu soone ouertooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, & threw his carkasse into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the vniust possessour. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was ioyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Iezabel might soone be aduertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her owne eies behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose iudgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when she least expected it. But shee, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her selfe ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at least-wise some Apophthegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did she thinke vpon the hungry dogs that were ordained to deuoure her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she beautified her eies, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith shee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neere, she opened her window, & looking out vpon him, began to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long enioyed the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoeuer laudable, if they haue an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder of her life in seeking to vexe him, hee made her presently to vnderstand her owne estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her seruants to know which of them would be on his side, and soone found them ready to offer their seruice, before the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon hee commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the iudgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own seruants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subiect, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemie sate on Horse-backe, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body vnder foot. Her dead carcasse that was left without the walls, was deuoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia king of Iuda fleeing a-pace from Iehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked, & receiuing his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this fauour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, hauing reigned about one yeere.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chro 22.9. After the death of Ahazia, it is said that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her sonne, haue giuen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedegree of Ioas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoyled of her sonne, vnder whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her self, and reigne as Queen, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, & made Counsellors vnto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, & ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; & as likely it is that the great execution done by Ieboram, vpon the Princes, & many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stir, whatsoeuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it be, is seldome or neuer so shameleſſe as to refuse the cõmoditie of goodly pretences offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serue to colour her proceedings. Wherfore it were not absurd for vs to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royal bloud, all of them in a manner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistims, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she giue him to vnderstand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Dauid, which now remained only in his Family, should by any accident faile (as woful experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions he laid vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might bee gotten thereby, did not already contriue the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherfore it were the wisest way to designe by his authoritie, not only his successour, but also the reuertioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer be subiect to any rifling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his own posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the iealous Tyrant think, that the onely way to frustrate all deuices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to vphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might she do it in her sonnes. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wiues, in respect of his owne-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgat her self so far in her vvicked policie, that she lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring vnto her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faine some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being sent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another World. But I rather thinke that shee tooke order

der for her affaires before-hand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or feare the sudden death of her sonne, yet it was the wisest way to prouide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands issue by other women was yong and vnable to resist. We plainely finde that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and fortie, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long iourny, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could bee growne to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainement in Iezabels house would onely haue beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as haue aspired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could giue, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath beene already in the old time that was before vs. Eccles. 1. 10. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might alien the Crown from his naturall Heires, Dauid had giuen proofe; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, and was entring into another. Iehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than hee: 2 Chro. 21. 13. Dauid purchased the kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Iehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that hee might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to bee answered with the words which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Ioash: Behold, the Kings sonne must reigne; as the Lord hath said of the sonnes of Dauid. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoeuer it might be, to the Crown of Iuda; yet it is most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so she held it sixe whole yeeres, and a part of the seauenth, in good seeming securitie.

§. II.

How Iehu spent his time in Israel, so that he could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Iehu did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason hee was likely to desire, being an enemie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein hee was so far ouercharged, that hardly he could retaine his own, much lesse attempt vpon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Iehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set vp some one as King, and to prepare themselues to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well vnderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly affraid of him, they offered him their seruice; wherein they so readily shewed themselues obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were inioyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great sacrifice to their god, by which meanes hee drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no king of Israel had euer greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to feare lest the people should bee allured vnto the house of Dauid; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crown of Iuda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had receiued his kingdom by the vnexpected grace grace of God; and further in regard of his zeale expreſſed in deſtroying Baal out of Iſrael, hee was promiſed, notwithſtanding his following the ſinne of Ieroboam, that the kingdome ſhould remaine in his Familie, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not ſerue; he would needs helpe to peece out Gods prouidence with his owne circumſpection; doing therin like a foolish greedy gamester, who by stealing a needleſſe Card to aſſure himſelfe of winning a ſtake, forfeits his whole teſt. Hee had queſtionleſſe diſpleaſed many, by that which he did againſt Baal; and many more he ſhould offend by taking from them the vſe of a ſuperſtition, ſo long practiſed as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all theſe, how many ſoeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him king, if God, whom (to retaine them) hee now forſooke, had not giuen him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Iſrael, whereof Hazael king of Damaſcus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Eliseus, who fore-told it, ſaying: Their ſtrong Cities ſhalt thou ſet on fire, and their young men ſhalt thou ſlay with the ſword, and ſhalt daſh their Infants againſt the ſtones, and rent in pieces their women with childe. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cauſe the ruine of his whole houſe, but the obſtinate Idolatry of the people bring a lamentable miſery vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the deſtruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuaſion; but hee ſmote them in all the coaſt of Iſrael, and waſted all the Countrie beyond the Riuer of Iordan. Notwithſtanding all theſe calamities, it ſeemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in theſe daies the Lord began to loathe Iſrael,) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble Houſe of Ahab, vnder which they had beaten thoſe enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conqueſt of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to reſtore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull ſhifts, liuing vnder a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Maſter that had put him in truſt, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly fals out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in ſerving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in ſtead of the eaſe & pleaſure to themſelues propounded by contrary courſes, ouer-whelmed with the troubles which they ſought to auoide; and therein by God whom they firſt forſooke, forſaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wiſedome, wherin they had repoſed all their confidence.

§. III.

Of Athaliahs Gouernment.

THeſe calamities falling vpon Iſrael, kept Athalia ſafe on that ſide, giuing her leiſure to looke to things at home; as hauing little to doe abroad, vnleſſe it were ſo that ſhee held ſome correſpondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father king Aſa, who had done the like. And ſome probability that ſhe did ſo, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake vp the houſe of God, and all things that were dedicate for the houſe of the Lord did they beſtow vpon Baalim. Such a ſacriledge, though it proceeded from a deſire to ſet out her owne Idolatry, with ſuch pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want ſome faire pretext of neceſſity of the State ſo requiring: in which caſe others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next ſucceſſour was faine to doe the like, being thervnto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taſte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his ſake.

2 Chro. 24. 7.

Vnder this impious gouernment of Athalia, the deuotion of the Prieſts and Leuites was very notable, and ſerued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himſelfe, howſoeuer the Queenes proceedings aduanced the contrary. For the pouerty of that ſacred Tribe of Leui muſt needes haue been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and poſſeſſions in the ten Tribes being vtterly loſt, the oblations and other perquiſites, by which they liued, being now very few, and ſmall; and the ſtore ſtore laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhamefull robberie. Yet they vp-held in all this miſery the ſeruice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping daily their courſes, and performing obedience to the high Prieſt, no leſſe than in thoſe dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IIII.

Of the preſeruation of Ioas.

Iehoiada then occupied the high Prieſthood, an honourable, wiſe, and religious man. To his carefulnes it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort vp-held in thoſe vnhappy times. His wife was Iehoſhabeth, who was daughter of king Ieboram, & ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whoſe pietie makes it ſeeme that Athalia was not her mother, though her acceſſe to the Court argue the contrary: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers houſe, than the education vnder ſuch a Mother could haue permitted her to bee ſuch as ſhe was. By her care, Ioaſh the yongue Prince that reigned ſoone after, was conueighed out of the nourſery, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings children, and was carried ſecretly into the Temple, where as ſecretly hee was brought vp. How it came to paſſe that this yongue childe was not hunted our, when his body was miſſing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people ſhould heare ſay, that one of the children had auoyded that cruell blow; it might haue made them hearken after innouations, and ſo be the leſſe conformable to the preſent gouernment. So Ioaſh was deliuered out of that ſlaughter, he and his nurſe being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to be caſt away, as hauing no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him ſucke, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe her ſelfe ſhould haue been ſlaine, was fled away with him into ſome deſolate place, where it was like enough that ſhe and he ſhould periſh. In ſuch caſes flatterers, or men deſirous of reward, eaſily coine ſuch tales, and rather ſweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will loſe the thankes due to their ioyfull tidings.

§. V.

Whoſe ſonne Ioas was.

†. I.

Whether Ioas may be thought likely to haue been the ſon of Ahazia.

NOw concerning this Ioaſh, whoſe ſonne hee was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath cauſed much controuerſie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the ſonne of Ahazia, ſeeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giue title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that hee was his Succeſſour, I neither by my ſelfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to anſwer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that thinke him to haue beene, or not, the naturall ſonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is ſaid, that the houſe of Ahazia was not able to retaine the Kingdome; ſome doe inferre that this Ioaſh was not properly called his Son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore ſucceeded him, as a ſonne in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For ſhee perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom ſhe had no intereſt, might eaſily finde cauſe to feare, that the tyranny exerciſed by her husband at her inſtigation vpon ſo many noble Houſes, would now bee reuenged vpon her ſelfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this caſe terrifie both her and her Minions; the ſentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedy of Iezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had been heire to the Crowne; for ſhe that had power enough to make her ſelfe Queene, could with more eaſe, and leſſe enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie ſhe might haue done her pleaſure, and been the more both obeyed by others,

2 King. 11. 2. & 2 chro. 22. 11

2 chro. 22. 9.

and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherfore it was not needfull that she should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the childe of her owne son, of whose life she might haue made greater vse, than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the loue of Grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessity vrgeth, nor any commoditie therby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would haue perswaded.

†. II.

That Ioas did not descend from Nathan.

BVt (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might haue otherwise bin) the pedegree of this Ioash is, by them which think him not the sonne of Ahazia, set downe in such sort that it may very iustly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of Dauid, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of Dauid, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid, there are that would haue him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Dauid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he reuoked it, as was meete; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of Dauid, by Bathsua the daughter of Ammes, and therfore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioash, deriuing him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to haue been the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, & Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begottten of his mother, doe approue this exposition: for we reade of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did liue. So that the rest must needes haue beene the children of Vria, and are thought to haue beene Dauids only by adoption. Wherefore if Ioas had not beene the son of Ahazia, then must that pedegree haue beene false, wherein S. Matthew deriueth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Sauiour issued from the loynes of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had only beene of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might haue been. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioash was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he list.

1. Chron. 3. 5. 3

†. III.

That Ioas may probably be thought to haue been the sonne of Iehoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinkes it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Iehoram the son of Iehosaphat King of Iuda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise hee would giue him a light, and to his children for euer: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Iehoram, there was not a sonne left him, saue Iehoahas the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Iehoram vpon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians vpon the children of Iehoram, one of the seed of Dauid escaped; why may it not bee thought that he was said to haue escaped, in whom the line of Dauid was preserued: for had all the race of Salo-

2. King. 8. 19.

now beene rooted vp in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would haue beene extant, of an euent so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparant by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preseruation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Iehoahas, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the natural, and not only legall issue remaining of Dauid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Ioash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongest sonne of Ioram, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily vnderstood, why the preseruation of Dauids line, by Gods especiall mercy, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when besides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwards were all slain by Iehu; than haue reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one only did escape. Certainely that inhumane murther which Ioram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heauie iudgement laid vpon Ioram and all his children, only Iehoahas his yongest son was exempted; whom therfore if I should affirme to be the same with Ioas, which is called the son of Ahazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessity there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise haue beene. For it was the yongest sonne of Ioram in whom the race was preserued; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that hee was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that Ioram should haue begotten many children before hee was eighteene yeeres old, or that hauing (as hee had) many wiues and children, hee should vpon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must haue beene true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Iehoahas, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconuenience is taken away, & those other doubts arising from the causelesse cruelty of Athalia, in seeking the life of Ioas, are easily cleered, if Ioas and Iehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion. For he was seuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if we vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might haue been a yeere old at the death of Ioram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickneſſe. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall son of Ioram, though called the son of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors haue done, this difficulty notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might haue serued as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahas, that soundeth much more neere to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an Englisn eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diuersitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it bee so that Ahazia himselfe bee also called Azaria, and must haue had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoahas; in which manner Ioas might also haue had seuerall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniecture, but leaue all to the consideration of such as haue more abilitie to iudge, and leasure to consider of this point.

Vpon what reasons Athalia might seeke to destroy Ioas, if he were her owne grandchilde.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly receiued, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions

ons of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some vnnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chaste) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married vnto Ieboram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certaine it is that shee had sonnes of her own, and those old enough to be employed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the Crown vpon her own children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for Ioas, if in 2. Kin. 9. 22. she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would haue in him, lest when he came to yeeres, it might draw him from her deuotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wiues) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for shee made him spend all his time in idle iourneyes, to no other apparant end, than that she might rule at home; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his tutoresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine deuises, then was Athalia faine to go roundly to worke, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Ioas, we need not seeke into the reasons mouing her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Ioas, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this History, and the diuersitie between it and others, the lesse me thinkes I need to suspect mine owne presumption, as deseruing blame, for curiosity in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of coniecture. For all Histories do giue vs information of humane counsailes & euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speak only at randome, and many times falsly. This we often finde in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great vndertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Iewes in Egypt vnto Ieremy the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoeuer the written Law of God was known vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof, were verie terrible, and euen then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Ier. 44. 17. 18. Princes had vsed to doe: For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill: adding that all manner of miseries were befalne them, since they left off that seruice of the Queene of Heauen. So blinde is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde out, there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not peruerted by vaine additions.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel & Iuda hath herein a singular prerogatiue aboue all that haue beene written by the most sufficient of meerely humane authors: it setteth downe expresly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouer-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his family, to the securitie of Ieboram in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the cōming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not vary, this Storie, by many great examples, giues most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps haps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwais true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discouer the passions which doe set them first on foot. Wherfore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Liuie euery one circumstance of Claudius his iourney against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historicall, nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which haue gouerned their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they doe collect the most likely motiues or impediments of euery businesse; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquity in proceeding. Sir Ph. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to giue assurance, howsoeuer it may giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearcheable: and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them, and into such as liue about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill mists, they conceale the truth from all reports. Yea, manie times the affections themselues lye dead, and buried in obliuion, when the preparations which they begat, are conuerted to another vse. The industrie of an Historian, hauing so many things to wearie it, may well bee excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that seemes farre greater. So comes it manie times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or townes, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seene; when the flame is discouered, hauing fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greekes, proceeded from desire of the Persians to inlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterprize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before hee had receiued any iniury, & when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enioy what was already gotten. Herod. l. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more iustly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleadging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldly affirme, (hauing, I thinke, in euery estate some sufficient witnesse) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon substantiall reasons, haue issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visit him in his Popedome, as hauing long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old liberty of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politition, to attaine vnto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the Conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needes must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou liued abroad as I haue done, and seen by what follie this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this bee referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moued, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if wee lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Goeurnour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Iupiter:

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & vrbes, regnaq; tristia
Diuosq; mortalesq; turmas,
Imperio regit vnus aequo.

Who rules the duller earth, the windeswolne streames,
The ciuill Cities and th' infernall realmes,
Who th' host of heauen, and the mortall band,
Alone doth gouerne by his iust command.

Then shall we finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertainety nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things desposeth to his owne honour; He neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemes at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soule, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they haue only this miserable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the seruice of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happines, & hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoeuer; though indeede those brambles that sometimes teare the skin of such as walke in this blessed way, do commonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, & make them wish themselues at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for euermore. Psal. 16. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdome as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know; as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisedome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captiuity: wee may well beleeue that the counsaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should haue occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the lesse true, though they might haue beene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherin he should not haue done iniury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I haue now in hand: wherein I cannot beleeue that any man of iudgement will taxe me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he deprane the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in euery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty, which I haue vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vse when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor mis-beseeming an Historirn.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now sixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forreine enemy, nor domesticall aduersarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wicwickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the yongue Prince began to bee such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very vnfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to haue beene indued with the stomacke and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spead it selfe ouer all the Country, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore he associated vnto himselfe fiue of the Captaines, in whose fidelity he had best assurance; and hauing taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, he made a Couenant with them, to aduance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first only that they should repaire to Ierusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Dauid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, & likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, and other associats of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so manie trusty & seruiceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Diuine seruice at the Temple, and were now relieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart vntill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made vp such a number, as would be able to deale with the Queenes ordinary Guard: and that was enough; for if the Tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leuites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were bestowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King Dauid had left an Armory to the place, which was now imployed to defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high design e vvas to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard vnto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilest yet it may be preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of inuitable mischiefe.

All Ierusalem was full of the runnour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common ioy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing & beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folkes in the streetes, making towards the Temple, with much vnusuall passion in their lookes, did presently conceiue, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened, though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoeuer it were, shee meant to vse her owne wisedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that she thought it some especiall solemnitie vsed in the Diuine seruice, vvhich caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and of other deuout men, about the towne, might giue some presumption. 2. Chron. 23. 12.

Many things argue that she little thought vpon her owne Tragedy; although Iosephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the 2. Chron. 23. 12. & 13. 2. 1. King. 11. v. 13. 14.

Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, ſhee rent her clothes, and cryed Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appeares that ſhe was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or feare, to take her place; which when ſhe found occupied by another, then ſhe began to afflict her ſelfe, as one caſt away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treaſon, whereby ſhe ſaw that ſhe muſt periſh. But that ſhe came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Ioſephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten backe, ſhee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had ſhe truely known how things went, ſhe would ſurely haue gathered her friends about her, and vſed thoſe forces in defence of her Crown, by which ſhe gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainely, if it were granted, that ſhe, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madneſſe in her, to enter the place alone, when her aſſiſtants were kept out; but if ſhee, perceiuing that neither her authority, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let-in her guard, would neuertheleſſe take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a childe of ſeuen yeeres old a Conſpirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ſhe ſaw to be armed in his defence, may we not thinke that ſhee was mad in the moſt extreame degree? Certaine it is that the counſaile of God would haue taken effect, in her deſtruction, had ſhe vſed the moſt likely meanes to diſappoint it: yet vvee neede not ſo cut her throate with any morall impoſſibilities. It is enough to ſay, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more eaſie ſucceſſe, through her indiſcretion, than otherwiſe could haue beene expected; ſo that at his appointment, ſhee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and ſlaine, yea ſo, that no bloud, ſaue her owne, vvas ſhed in that quarrell; her ſmall train that ſhe brought along with her, not daring to ſtand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a compariſon of her and Iezabel.

MOſt like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the raſhneſſe of her Nephew Iehoram the Iſraelite, who did fooliſhly caſt himſelfe into the very throate of danger, gaping vpon him, onely through his eager deſire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet, ſhee her ſelfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and hauing liued ſuch a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a ſutable death. Theſe two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatreſſe and a Murdreſſe. The onely difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them ſuruiuing her husband about eight yeeres, did ſpend their time in ſatisfying her owne affections; the one vſing tyrannie, as the exerciſe of her haughty minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaſte body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in thoſe things which may ſeeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the ſuddaine by Conſpirators, and each of them exclaiming vpon the Treaſon, receiued ſentence from the mouth of one that had liued vnder her ſubiection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled vnder the feet of her enemies horſes; Athalia ſlaine at her owne horſe-gate; the death of Athalia hauing (though not much) the more leiſure to vexe her proud heart; that of Iezabel the more indignitie, and ſhame of bodie. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that ſhe was buried, as hauing not perſecuted and ſlaine the Lords Prophets, but ſuffered the Prieſts to exerciſe their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for ſhe was a Church-robber. The ſeruice of Baal erected by theſe two Queenes, was deſtroyed as ſoone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Prieſts of that Religion, ſlaine. Herein alſo it came to paſſe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who ſlew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the ſame hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who ſeemes to haue beene her good friend) pretended her reuenge, as anie part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel periſhed in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; ſhe had ſons liuing after ſhe was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were ſlaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthy of conſideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ieruſalem when their Mother fell, their death would ſurely haue followed hers as neerely, and beene regiſtred, as well as the death of Mattan the Prieſt of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children ſhould die for the fathers, could not haue ſaued theſe vngracious Impes, whom the clauſe following would haue cut off, which commands, that euerie man ſhould die for his owne ſinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene profeſſors and aduancers of that vile and Idolatrous worſhip of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the houſe of Baal with the ſpoyle of it; likely it is, that they ſhould not haue eſcaped with life, if Iehoiada the Prieſt could haue gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cauſe enough requiring their death, ſo the ſecurity of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earneſtly. For theſe had beene eſteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her aſſiſtants in that particular buſineſſe of robbing the Temple, may bee thought to haue carried a great ſway in other matters, as Princes, & fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres againſt Iehu) abſent from Ieruſalem; whereby Iehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes againſt their Mother, that was deſolate. Deut. 24. 16.

Chap. XXII.

Of Ioas and Amaſia, with their Contemporaries; where ſomewhat of the building of Carthage.

Of Ioas his doings, whileſt Iehoiada the Prieſt liued.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietneſſe; wherein Ioas, a childe of ſeuen yeeres old or there-about, began his reigne, which continued almoſt fortie yeeres. During his minority, he liued vnder the protection of that honourable man Iehoiada the Prieſt, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preſerued the Kings life, & reſtored him vnto the Throne of his anceſtors. When he came to mans eſtate, he tooke by appoinment of Iehoiada two wiues, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of Dauid, which was almoſt worne out. The firſt Act that hee tooke in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickedneſſe of vngodly Tyrants; and requiſite it was that he ſhould vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This buſineſſe he followed with ſo earneſt a zeale, that not only the Leuites were more ſlacke than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe impoſed by Moſes, partly out of the liberality of the people: who gaue ſo freely, that the Temple, beſides all reparations, was enriched with veſſels of gold and ſiluer, and with all other Vtenſiles. The ſacrifices likewiſe were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the ſeruice of God was magnificently celebrated. 2. Chron. 24. 14.

§. II.

The death of Iehoiada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

BVt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Prieſt: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeers, dyed before his Countrie could haue ſpared him. He was buried among the kings of Iuda, as he well deſerued, hauing preſerued the race of them, & reſtored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that houſe, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themſelues, and all their iſſue. Yet this honourable Funerall ſeems to haue bin giuen to him, at the motion of the people; it being ſaid, They buried him in the Citie of Dauid. As for the king himſelfe, who did owe to him no leſſe than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to haue been Author of it, ſeeing that he was as eaſily comforted after his death, as if he had therby been diſcharged of ſome heauie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda began to flatter their king, he ſoone forgat, not onely the benefits, receiued by this worthy man his old Counſellour, but alſo the good precepts which he had receiued from him, yea & God himſelfe, the Author of all goodneſſe. Theſe Princes drew him to the worſhip of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had ſo infected the Country, in fifteene or ſixteene yeeres; that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Ioas, wherein the true Religion was exerciſed, were not able to cleere it from that miſchiefe. The king himſelfe, when once he was entred into theſe courſes, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to deſpiſe the ſeruice of God; and a manifeſt proofe of his being now king indeede, that he regarded no longer the ſowre admonitions of deuout Prieſts. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor vpon the ſtage, he had ſtriuen to expreſſe much more liuely affection, than they could ſhew, that were indeede religious.

§. III.

The cauſes and times of the Syrians inuading Iuda in the dayes of Ioas.

BVt God, from whom he was broken looſe, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not eaſily be ſhaken off. Hazael king of Aram, hauing taken Gath, a Town of the Philiſtims, addreſſed himſelfe towards Ieruſalem, whither the little diſtance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did inuite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the kings of Iuda had aſſiſted the Iſraelites, in their enterpriſes vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think he did not want ſome further inſtigation. For if the kingdome of Iuda had moleſted the Aramites, in the time of his predeceſſour, this was throughly recompenſed, by forbearing to ſuccour Iſrael, and leauing the ten Tribes in their extream miſery, to the fury of Hazael himſelfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael ſhould haue gone about to awake a ſleeping Dogge, and ſtirre vp againſt himſelfe a powerfull enemy, before he had aſſured the conqueſt of Iſrael, that lay between Ieruſalem and his owne kingdome, if ſome opportunity had not performed ſuch eaſie and good ſucceſſe, as might rather aduance, than any way diſturbe his future proceedings againſt the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the ſonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promiſing (as men expelled their Countries vſually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his ſide; and not to remaine, as Ioas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Iſrael, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cauſe, for the rooting out of Iehu his poſterity, who, like a bloudy Traytor, had vtterly deſtroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole houſe of Ahab, to which hee was a ſubiect. If this were ſo, Hazael had the more apparant reaſon to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howſoeuer it were, we finde it plainely, that Ioas was affraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treaſures of the houſe of the Lord, or in his owne houſe, with which preſent hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (queſtionleſſe) thinking it a better bargaine, to get ſo much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the aſſurance of this, for for the poſſibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of vnhappy treaſure, which belonging to the liuing God, remained a ſmall while in the poſſeſſion of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but ſent him quickely to the graue. For in the thirtie ſeuenth yeere of Ioas, which was the fifteenth of Iehoahaz, hee made this purchaſe; but in the ſame or very next yeere he died, leauing all that hee had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom theſe treaſures proſpered no otherwiſe, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterpriſe of Hazael, is, by ſome, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the ſecond Booke of Chronicles. But the reaſons alleadged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly proue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud-ſhed or fight; in the latter, Ioas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherin being put to the worſt, he loſt all his Princes, and hardly eſcaped with life: In the one, Hazael himſelfe was preſent; in the other, he was not named: but contrariwiſe, the king of Aram then reigning (who may ſeem to haue then been the Sonne of Hazael) is ſaid to haue beene at Damaſcus. The firſt Armie came to conquer, and was ſo great, that it terrified the king of Iuda; The ſecond was a ſmall company of men, which did animate Ioas (in vaine; for God was againſt him) to deale with them, as hauing a very great Armie. 2.Chron.24.24

Now, concerning the time of this former inuaſion, I cannot perceiue that God forſooke him, till he had firſt forſaken God. There are indeed ſome, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iehoiada the Prieſt, becauſe that ſtorie is ioyned vnto the reſtauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the ſecond Book of Kings; or if the Apoſtaſie of Ioas, or any other matter implying ſo much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may diſpoſe of all things, according to his own will & pleaſure; neither was he more vniuſt in the afflictions of Iob that righteous man, or the death of Iоſias that godly king, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his iudgements vpon the houſe of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent ſeruice of God therwithall, which are ioyned together, were vſed in the houſe of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Iehoiada; ſoone after whoſe death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as ſome very learnedly collect) in the ſixe, or thirty ſeuenth yeere of this Ioas his reign, the king falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater. 2.Chron.24.14

And indeed we commonly obſerue, that the croſſes which it hath pleaſed God ſometimes to lay vpon his ſeruants, without any cauſe notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwaies tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which reſpect, euen the ſufferings of the bleſſed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the ſight of the Lord) are to their great aduantage. But with euill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen and ſtrict account; permitting vſually their faults to get the ſtart of their puniſhment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) til their wickedneſſe be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but ſuffering them to run on in their wicked courſes, to their greater miſerie. So hath he dealt with many; and ſo it appeares that he dealt with Ioas. For this vnhappy man did not onely continue an obſtinate Idolater, but grew ſo forgetfull of God and all goodneſſe, as if he had ſtrouen to exceed the wickedneſſe of all that went before him, and to leaue ſuch a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the moſt barbarous Tyrants ſhould endure to imitate. Pſal.115.15

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murthered by Ioas.

SVndry Prophets hauing laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their ſuperſtition, Zacharia the ſonne of Iehoiada the Prieſt, was ſtirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admoniſh them of their wickedneſſe, and make them vnderſtand the puniſhment due vnto it, whereof they ſtood in danger. This Zacharia was a man ſo much honoured, and ſonne to a man ſo exceedingly beloued in his lifetime, and reuerenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought he in common honeſtie, to haue cloaked his ill affection, and haue vſed at leaſt ſome part of the reſpect that was due to ſuch a perſon: On the other ſide, the ſingular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his firſt infancie, were ſuch, as ſhould haue placed Zacharia in the moſt hearty and aſſured loue of Ioas, yea though he had bin otherwiſe a man of very ſmall marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the meſſage of a Prophet ſent from God, ſhould be heard with reuerence, how ſimple ſoeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas, hauing already ſcorned the admonitions and proteſtations of ſuch Prophets as firſt were ſent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen in that parable of our Sauiour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who ſaid, This is the heyre, come let vs kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an abſolute Commander, ſuppoſing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durſt tell him the plain truth, how great ſoeuer that mans deſeruing were, that did ſo, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conſpired againſt this holy Prophet, and ſtoned him to death at the kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practiſed vpon Naboth; or whether ſurpriſing him by any cloſe treachery; I doe neither reade, nor can conieƈture. The dignitie of his perſon, conſidered together with their treacherous conſpiracie, makes it probable, that they durſt not call him into publique iudgement, though that the manner of his death, being ſuch as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Moſt likely it is, that the kings commandement, by which hee ſuffered, tooke place in ſtead of Law: which exerciſe of meer power (as hath been already noted) was nothing ſtrange amongſt the kings of Iuda.

Luk. 20. 14.

§. V.

How Ioas was ſhamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an vnthankefull ſnake vpon the man in whoſe boſome he had been foſtered, as of it ſelf alone it ſufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his own time, & his memory deteſted in all ages; ſo had it the well-deſcribed curſe of the bleſſed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, & to call for vengeance from thence; which fell downe ſwiftly, & heauily vpon the head of that vngratefull monſter. It was the laſt yeere of his reign; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himſelf beginning to liue how he liſted without controulment. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie, rather as may ſeem to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a ſmall company of men: but God had intended to doe more by them, than they themſelues did hope for.

2. Chron. 24. 24.

That Ioas naturally was a coward, his bloudy malice againſt his beſt friend, is, in my iudgement, proofe ſufficient: though otherwiſe his baſe compoſition with Hazael, when he might haue leauied (as his ſon after him did muſter) three hundred thouſand choſen men for the warre, doth well enough ſhew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how ſtout of diſpoſition their King was, when hee might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rouers, hee tooke a very great Armie, ſo that wiſe men might well perceiue, that he knew what he did, making ſhew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expoſe himſelfe to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oſtentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth ſo ſtrongly appointed, againſt ſo weak enemies. Thus might wiſe men thinke, and laugh at him in ſecret; conſidering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparant reaſon was (as they ſay) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wiſedome of this world is fooliſhneſſe, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King ſecure, by reaſon of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Ioas met, whether it were by ſome folly of the Leaders, or by ſome amazement happening among the ſouldiers, or by whatſoeuer means it pleaſed God to work, ſo it was, that that great Army of Iuda receiued a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were deſtroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whoſe perſwaſion the King had become a Rebell to the King of kings. As for Ioas himſelfe (as Abulenſis and others expound expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessiue ransome.

And surely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this coniecture. For the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised vpon Ioas ignominious iudgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauouredly. Now at that time Ioas the sonne of Iehoahaz reigned ouer Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael ouer the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant vnder-taking Prince, raised vp by God to restore the State of his miserable Country; the other inferiour euery way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as afterward followed, might haue giuen to the king of Iuda good cause to be bold, and plucke vp his spirits; which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian king in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of Warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good successe hereof, already related, & the (perhaps as vnexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following Warres against the king of Israel, sheweth plainely the weakenesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the kingdome of Iuda, after more than forty yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of Enemies; and the kingdome of Israel, hauing so been trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, tenne Chariots, and tenne thousand Footmen were left; preuailed against his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euerie-where found, and therefore I will not insist vpon this; though indeede wee should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heauenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers vpon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, & saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Iuda loaden with spoyle, which they sent to Damascus, themselues belike falling vpon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not halfe so wel. The king of Iuda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitesse, & of a Moabitesse, whom some (becauſe onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) thinke to haue beene bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, lest (as Tyrants vse) he should reuenge his disaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoeuer else it were that animated them to murder their king; the Scripture tels vs plainly, that, For the bloud of the children of Iehoiada, this befell him. And the same appears to haue beene vsed as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the sonne and successor of Ioas, durst not punish them, till his kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was iudged vnworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the king, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserued death. 2 Chro. 24. 25

Of the Princes liuing in the time of Ioas: of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dido.

THere liued with Ioas, Mezades & Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Syluius, and after him Syluius Alladius, were kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seuenth king succeeding vnto Ophratanes, began his reigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of Ioas, which lasted forty two yeeres. In the sixteenth of Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded vnto Cheops in the kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres.

In this time of Ioas, was likewise the reigne of Pygmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido; the building of which City is, by diuers Authors, placed in diuers ages, some reporting it to be 70. yeeres yonger than Rome, others aboue 400. yeers elder, few or none of them giuing any reason of their assertions, but leauing vs vncertaine whom to follow: Iosephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred Iosep. Cont. App. l. b. 1. forty and three yeeres and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeer of Hyram king of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seuenth of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Iosephus) are very perplexed, and serue not very well to make cleer the totall summe. But whether it were so that Iosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the yeers, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were diuided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleeue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books hee giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of Ioas, was a hundred forty and three yeeres before the birth of Rome, and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that wee might truely conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Auson. ep. 117.

Illa ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchra, & mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens,
Vita nec incestis lata cupidinibus,
(Nam & nec Æneas vidit me Troius vnquam
Nec Lybiam aduenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atq; arma proterua Iarbæ,
Seruaui, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo, casus quod pertulit ensis)
Non furor, aut laeso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse iuuat: vixi sine vulnere famæ,
Vltaq; virum, positis mœnibus oppetij.
Inuida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret vt nostræ damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusq; canunt.
Falsidici vates: temerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisq; deos æstimulant vitijs.

Which in effect is this,

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
Cunningly framed in beauteous Imag'rie.
Like this I was, but had not such a soule,
As Maro fained, incestuous and foule.
Æneas neuer with his Troian hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mou'd by furious loue or iealousie;
I did with weapon chaste, to saue my fame,
Make way for death vntimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Towne,
Reueng'd by husbands death, liu'd with renowne.
Why did'st thou stirre vp Virgil, enuious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers beleeue Historians; not those Which to the world Ioues thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyers, and for verses sake
Will make the gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we finde in many Histories: but in particular we finde little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne. Of Ioas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazia, the son of Ioash, being twenty fiue yeeres old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherin he laboured so to demeane himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensiue. The Law of Moses he professed to obserue; which howsoeuer it had beene secretly despised since the time of Ieboram, by many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea & of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himselfe vnto it. And at that present time, the slaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawne the late king from the seruice of God, being seconded by the death of the king himself, euen whilest that execrable murther, committed by the king vpon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serue as a notable example of Gods iustice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an euill end. He therefore, hauing learned of his father the art of dissimulatiou, did not onely forbeare to punish the Traytors that had slain king Ioas, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Ieboram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the kings of Iuda. Neuertheless, after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoeuer their deed done, was applauded as the handie worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as hauing done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the king, who perceiued his gouernment well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heate of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods iudgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue: which could not but giue contentment to the people, seeing that their king did the office of a iust Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life better secured, by such examplary iustice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, & so continued in rest, about twelue or thirteen yeeres.

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commodity of a long peace, so Ioas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu, sufficed not to wirh-draw him from this politique Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Iehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subiects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the ten Tribes recouered apace; but the fauour of God, which had beene infinitely more wroth, I doe not finde, nor beleeue that they sought: that they had it not, I finde in the words of the Prophet, saying plainely to Amazia, The Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim. 2. Chron. 25. 7.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who liued in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites vnder the reigne of Ioas; or whether Iehoahaz, wearied and broken with long aduersity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heauie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian Warres, by layiug the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; wee finde that in the thirtie seuenth yeere of Ioas, King of Iuda, Ioas the sonne of Iehoahaz began to reigne ouer Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. yeere of his fathers reigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

2. King. 13. 10.

It appeares that this yongue Prince, euen from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poore stock that he receiued from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For Ioas visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which maner of speech he did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

2 King. 13. 14.

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ahab king of Israel, died (as some haue probably collected) about the third or fourth yeere of this Ioas, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead childe vnto life, as Elias had done; but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcass, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did set Israel in a faire way of recouering all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakned the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his warre against Edom; His Apostasie; and ouerthrow by Ioas.

THe happy successe which Ioas had found in his war against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherin himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand seruiceable men for the Wars; & his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, & the hire of many more. Cause of war he had very iust against the Edomites, who hauing rebelled in the time of his grand-father Ioram, had about fifty yeeres been vnreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the sloth and timerousnesse of his father Ioas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of Warre (excepting that vnhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence he hired for an hundred talents of siluer, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though Iosephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twentie thousand.

2. Chron. 25. 6. Ios. Antiq. Iud. lib. 9. c. 10.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if he strengthened himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therfore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon a piece of Iuda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their iourney, entered couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; ouer whom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which he threw from an high rocke; holding them, it seemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victory did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subiection of the Crowne of Iuda; which might be the cause of that seuerity, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends & kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Seir, Amazia took, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, wherby he might another yeere the better haue pursued the conquest of the whose countrey. How soeuer it were, he got both honour by the iourney, and gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthy King Amazia, that he set them vp to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense vnto them. 2 Chro. 25. 14.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gaue a churlish and threatning answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counseller, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, wherof these idols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the kings fancie; me thinkes, he should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby haue suffered himself to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad seruice which they had done to their old Clients, haue moued him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, that the same affections carried him from God, vnto the seruice of Idols, which afterwards moued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, & sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is said, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should haue limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau hauing broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had fore-told, should no more become his seruant. If therfore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrey of Edom, hee failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might haue well contented him. 2 Chro. 25. 11.

But there is a fooliish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honor of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly seene, that they, who entring into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giuer of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of aduantage; another, how he gaue checke to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Canon; euery one striuing to magnifie himself, whilest all forget God, as one that had not beene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe than he did, or in reason might expect, is deepely bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdome and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankefull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakenesse is the nature of such thankesgiuing, that it may wel be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man aduanceth it selfe vvith confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Æneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazia (as appears by his cariage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himselfe a better man of war than any king of Iuda, since the time of Iehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferior to Dauid: of which honour he saw no reason vvhy the Prophets should rob him, vvho had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he hauing preuailed by plaine force and good conduct, vvithout any miracle at all. That hee vvas distempered vvith such vaine thoughts as these (besides the vvitnesse of his impiety following) Iosephus doth testifie; Ios. Ant. l. 9. c. 10

testifie; saying, That he despised God, and that being puft vp with his good successe, of which neuertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Ioas King of Israel to become his subiect, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the iniury done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the iourney against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or fourteene yeeres. Neuertheless it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that so the kings of Israel might, at the least, learne to keepe their subiects from offending Iuda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia desired onely recompence for the iniurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should haue had some reasonable answer from Ioas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Ioas returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent tearmes, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might bee made (according to that which Iosephus hath written) between a king of ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

Sophocles in Aiace Lor. It is by Sophocles reported of Aiax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance, a coward could get victorie, but hee would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell vpon disgrace receiued, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vtter such wordes, I doe not finde: but hauing once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with successe according. The very first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when he had to deale with his equalls abroad. For it was not all one, to fight vvith the Edomites, a weake people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Ioas, who from so poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of iudgement, in vndertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, he behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who hauing once onely tried his fortune, and found it to bee good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Ioas on the contrary side, hauing beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemie than the king of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Country, but presented himselfe with an Army in Iuda, ready to bid battell to Amazia, and saue him the labour of a long iourney. This could not but greatly discourage those of Iuda; who (besides the impression of feare vvhich an inuasion beates into people, not inured in the like) hauing deuoured in their greedy hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselues to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the iourney of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their king that had stomack enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Dauid to winne it by the sword. The issue of which foole-hardinesse might easily haue beene foreseene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsoeuer it might foresee much, could not haue prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazia. For as soone as the two Armies came in sight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so despised, did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of Iuda, that without one blow giuen, they fled all away, leauing their king to shift for himselfe; which he did so ill, that his enemy had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect baseneſſe. That the Army which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither finde in the Scriptures nor in Iosephus; in being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the whole disgrace. For Ioas carried him directly to Ierusalem, where he bad him procure that the gates might bee opened to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captiue, with these dreadful words, that he durst do no other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselues to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwards being in weaker state, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should haue giuen his life to saue it, vsed all his force of cõmand and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Ierusalem were opened to Ioas, with vvhich honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) he could not rest contented, but, the more to despise Amazia and his people, he caused 400 cubits of the wall to be thrown downe, and entred the citie in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the king before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazia, he dismissed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering Ioas from vniting Iuda to the Crowne of Israel, when hee had won Ierusalem, and held Amazia prisoner. The end of Ioas his Reigne.

WEe may iustly maruell how it came to passe, that Ioas, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, hauing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, & his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when he might haue seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The reigne of Athalia had giuen him cause to hope, that the issue of Dauid might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobility, being the sonne and gran-childe of Kings, together vvith the famous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Iuda thinke highly of him; who might also haue preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, vvhen a long succession of vvicked Princes had smothered the thanks, which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that vvould haue ensued, vpon the vnion of all the twelue Tribes, vnder one Prince, is so apparant, that I neede not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie vvhich Peka the son of Romelia got vpon Ahaz) to turne his present aduantage, to the best vse, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so vvell exercised, as Ioas had beene, in recouering his own, and vvinning from his enemy, should forsake the possession of Ierusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so faire a conquest, as the kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, vvhich, of all others, had been most materiall, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their king, it is plainely seen, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ioas vvas vnable to concoct his own prosperitie. For, the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreaty (especially hauing sure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, vvhen they saw themselues betrayed, and basely giuen away by him whose they had beene before. The faire marke which this opportunitie presented, he did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely busied, in leuelling at the glory of a triumphant entry through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards haue been corrected well enough, if entring as an enemy, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the wals, he had within the City done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his couetousnesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most ready to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The Treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to haue tempted the appetite of Ioas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therfore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the consecrated vessels, calling the familie of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a strict account, as if they had beene officers of his owne Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely auoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselues one to one, perceiue his Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mighty town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnaduised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first errour; they will thinke vpon euery aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the euills growne out of their former cowardise, than suffer those mischiefes to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more liuely example hereof cannot be desired, than the City of Florence, which through the weakenesse of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard tearmes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainely professing himselfe either friend or foe to the State, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himself and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserue their libertie, were driuen to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bels: which peremptorie words made the French bethink themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not halfe of that money to bee paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoeuer hee had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon bee shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, vsually drawes euery Citizen to saue his own, leauing victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemie, hauing other things to looke vnto, can set on fire. And indeede that Commander is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertain hope of destroying a Towne, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diuersitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

1 Chro. 26. 15.

How strongly soeuer Ioas might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Iuda, which had been more terrified than weakened in the late encounter, should re-enforce it self, & giue him a check vpon the way. Wherfore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Army being vpon returne, and better loden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it down from aspiring to the Crown of Iuda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that hee should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vnto the fifth, sixth and seauenth yeeres of his age: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good successe, all might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could he haue either sent the Iudæan one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battel, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisha, that after three victories, Ioash should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite preuailed vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Reigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians taking aduantage of Ioas his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the king at his return was not able to remedie, but rather fell himself into new misfortunes, which incenſed the calamity; wee may euidently perceiue in that which is spoken of Ieroboam his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that hauing not decreed to put out the name of Israel from vnder the heauen, he preserued them by the hand of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas. This is enough to proue, that the victorious Reigne of Ioas was concluded with a sad catastrophe, the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceiued against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to set vpon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Country, to bid him battell in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honor which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these) Ioas was driuen to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of Iudæa, and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad welcome, and being vtterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsook also his life in few moneths after, leauing his kingdom to Ieroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant sonne.

The end of Amazia his Reigne and Life.

ANy man is able to ghesse how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatning to worke wonders, and set vp a new the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had beene painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that fals vpon an insolent man, seldeme failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of those calamities which happen by their owne default) there was no childe in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of War, being himselfe a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-say. The father of this Amazia, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so dear a rate, as the Citie and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they haue made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vnfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelite (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soon haue been rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would haue made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when hauing trussed vp his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would haue serued to perswade him to leaue his load behind; had not their good K. deliuered vp hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappie king: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But wee finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem: a manifest [a] 2 Chron. 25. 27.

proofe that he was not reclaimed vnto his liues end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his aduersity of his faults past, shall sooner be thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than euer they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselues might alwaies bee maisters, want'd not plausable matter to reuiue him. For he was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Iuda, that had beene ouercome in battell. Dauid himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leauing it, before the enemy was in sight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many besides him had receiued losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Ioas might so easily haue beene kept out, why did their Ancestors let Ioas in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather liue to punish them, than dye to please them. Though wherein had hee giuen them any cause of displeasure? It was hee indeede that commanded to set open the gates to Ioas, but it was the people that did it. Good seruants ought not to haue obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disaduantage, when they saw him not maister of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deepely to his losse. For had he been as hasty to flye, as others were; hee might haue escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Vnworthy creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, hee commanded them to yeeld; hauing neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand liues were saued; the enemy hauing wisely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was euen so indeed. And such excuses might haue serued well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (so long he out-liued his honor) we find not that he stirred. As for his subiects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his gouernment, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuere man. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the grauity of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they liue, which are subiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to him that does the wrong; at least it serues to dazle the eyes of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weakenesse of such as haue iurisdiction ouer them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vsing it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they do vsually mis-spend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vain & deceiueable course, procuring in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence, especially when an vnable spirit, being ouer-perted with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extream rigour to hold vp his reputation, what did he else than striue to make the people think he hated them, when of themselues they were apt enough to beleeue that he did not loue them? the best was, that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance (or vpon whom) of such a murther, wherin euery one had a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not giuen cōmandment or leaue vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the bloud of his Annointed. Yet as Amazia, careless of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections, so his subiects, following the euill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong furie, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driuen to forsake the Citie, and flye to Lachis, for safegard of his life. But so extreame was the hatred conceiued against him, and so generall, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Country abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionlesse hee chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found hee there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands, for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselues about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vtmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Iuda; so that hee might haue made an easie escape (if he durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seeme that hee was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leisure as they did, haue carried away his body to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Iuda, after the death of Amazia.

It hath already beene shewed, that the Reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to bee measured by compleat yeeres, otherwhiles, by yeeres current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Reigne, or the foremost of his sonnes. But we are now arriued at a meere vacation, wherin the Crown of Iuda lay voyd eleauen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly set downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Iosephus, and therfore hard to be beleeued, were it not proued by necessary consequence.

Twice we finde it written, that Amazia, King of Iuda, liued after the death of Ioas King of Israel fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of Amazia was made king ouer Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of Iuda, was eleauen yeeres later than the sixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to reigne in the seauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam; the sixteenth yeere of his life, being ioyned with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleauen yeers cannot be diuided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voyd time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, wee should perhaps vnderstand the seauen and twentieth yeere of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was eleauen yeeres vnder age, that is, fiue yeeres old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeere might concurre with the seauen and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the Text it selfe may haue suffered some wrong, by miswriting twenty seauen for seauenteene yeeres, and so, by making the seauenteenth yeere of Ieroboam to be newly begun, all may bee saued. These are the coniectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himself doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon euery doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Reign being fiue yeeres old, but then must wee adde those eleauen yeeres which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to auoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessity neceſſity hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the kingdome of Iſrael: The ſpace of time betweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zacharias Reigne, and ſuch another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hoſea, haue made it eaſily to be admitted into Samaria; which the conſideration of things as they ſtood in Iuda, when Amazia was ſlaine, doth make more probable to haue happened there, yea although the neceſſity of computation were not ſo apparant.

For the publicke furie, hauing ſo farre extended it ſelfe, as vnto the deſtruction of the kings own perſon, was not likely to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſſe of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to break forth into ſuch extremity. Wee neede not therefore wonder how it came to paſſe, that they which already had throwne themſelues into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inueſted in all ornaments of Regality, is neuerthelesſe expoſed to many iniuries, proceeding from head-ſtrong, and forgetfull ſubiects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azaria to haue beene King but one and fortie yeeres, after hee came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the Text. The beſt opinion were that, which giues vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeeres of Reigne with his Father, before hee began to reigne ſingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not ſwallow vp almoſt the whole reigne of Ioas, and extending the yeeres of thoſe which reigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat, as were onely current) and take at the ſhorteſt the Reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and ſee mine more plainely in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for theſe purpoſes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes liuing with Amazia, and in the eleauen yeeres that followed his death, were Ioas and Ieroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Phereclus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleclus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerauthræ, Amyclæ, and ſome other Townes.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazia, ſucceeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty yeeres, and was ſlaine the laſt of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Reign of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand, two hundred and forty yeeres. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he liued an vnhappy life, knowing himſelfe to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man haue a ſight of him; yet ſeene he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media vnder him, finding meanes to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle, of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, & ſtriuing to counterfeit an harlot, that hee thought it a great ſhame to liue vnder the command of ſo vnworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelfe and others from ſo baſe ſubiection, hee was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with the propheeie, did promiſe vnto Beloſus himſelf the gouernment of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſineſſe, one of them ſtirred vp the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrell, the other perſwaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelues in the ſame cauſe. Theſe foure Nations armed forty thouſand men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelfe, but gathering ſuch forces as he could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, anſwer to the manner of his retiredneſſe. For in three battailes he carried away the better, driuing Arbaces and his followers into such fearful termes, that had not Belesus promised them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Camp. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountring it vpon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces ioyned themselues with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, which through ouer-great security was vnprepared for resistance.

This ouerthrow did so weaken the kings heart, that leauing his wiues brother Salamenus to keep the field, he withdrew himself into the City of Niniue; which, till new aides that hee sent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it hauing beene prophecied, that Niniue should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemy to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Niuiue, enough hath beene spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (hauing in two battailes ouerthrown the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he saw no appearance. It seemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were a hundred foote high, and thicke enough for three Chariots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the Riuer of Tygris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the city through which it ranne, but threw downe twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting vp himselfe into his Palace, with his wiues, eunuches, and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith hee and they were together consumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, wheron was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsis vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate and drink, and make merry, encouraging others, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince. Strabo l. 9.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end, saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more general consent of Writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that liued in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known. Diod. Sicul. l. 2. c. 7.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleeue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensiue or else defensiue armes; yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were ouerpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memory. Whatsoeuer they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them. Diod. l. 2. c. 6. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 2.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Vzzia.

S. I.

The proſperitie of Vzzia, and of Ieroboam the ſecond, who reigned with him in Iſrael. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Ieroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem and Pekahia.

VZzia, who is alſo called Ahazia, the ſonne of Iotham, was made king of Iuda, when hee was ſixteene yeeres old, in the ſeauen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas king of Iſrael. Hee ſerued the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good ſucceſſe in all his enterpriſes. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that ſtood neere to the Red Sea, and reſtored it to Iuda. He ouercame the Philiſtims, of whoſe Townes he diſmantled ſome, and built others in ſundry parts of their Territories. Alſo he got the maſterie ouer ſome parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his proſperous warres, wherein (as Ioſephus rehearſeth his acts) hee began with the Philiſtims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie conſiſted of three hundred and ſeauen thouſand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thouſand and ſixe hundred Captaines. For all this multitude the king prepared ſhieldes, and ſpeares, and helmets, and other Armes requiſite; following therein happely a courſe quite oppoſite vnto that which ſome of his late predeceſſours had held, who thought it better policie to vſe the ſeruice of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Chariots.

2 Chro. 26. 14.

2 Chro. 21. 9.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of all that had reigned in Iuda, ſince the time of Dauid; ſo were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not ſuperiour to any of theirs that had beene kings betweene him and Salomon. For, beſides that great conqueſts are wonne to repay the charges of Warre with triple intereſt, he had the skill to vſe, as well as the happineſſe to get. He turned his Lands to the beſt vſe, keeping Ploughmen and Dreſſers of Vines, in grounds conuenient for ſuch husbandry. In other places he had Cattell feeding; whereof hee might well keepe great ſtore, hauing wonne ſo much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waſte ground ſeruing for paſturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardſmen, he built Towres in the wilderneſſe. He alſo digged many Ciſternes or Ponds. Ioſephus calls them Water-courſes; but in ſuch dry grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the moſt likely places. If by theſe Towres hee ſo commanded the water, that none could without his conſent, releeue themſelues therewith; queſtionleſſe he tooke the onely courſe, by which hee might ſecurely hold the Lordſhip ouer all the Wilderneſſe; it being hardly paſſable, by reaſon of the extreame drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vſe of Trauailers.

Beſides all this coſt, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of ſundry Townes among the Philiſtims; he repaired the wall of Ieruſalem, which Ioas had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof ſome were an hundred and fifty Cubits high.

The State of Iſrael did neuer ſo flouriſh, as at this time, ſince the diuiſion of the twelue Tribes into two kingdomes. For as Vzzia preuailed in the South, ſo (if not more) Ieroboam the ſonne of Ioas, king of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories againſt the Syrians, he wan the Royall citie of Damaſcus, and he wan Hamath, with all the country thereabout from the entring of Hamath, vnto the Sea of the Wilderneſſe, that is, (as the moſt expound it) vnto the vaſt deſerts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiſcouered. So the bounds of Iſrael in thoſe parts, were in time of this Ieroboam, the ſame (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the Reigne of Dauid.

2 King. 14. 25. 28.

But

But it was not for the piety of Ieroboam, that he thriued so well; for he vvas an Idolater: it vvas only the compassion vvhich the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, vvherevnto the Aramites had brought his people, vvhich caused him to alter the succession of vvarre, and to throw the victorious Aramites vnder the feete of those vvhom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to vvhich God had promised the kingdome of Israel vnto the fourth generation, was now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had been at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe, giuen to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatry; nor the misery falling vpon him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giuer of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto Iehu, that his sons, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged, but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we, who finde no particulars recorded, can hardly gheese at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

1 Reg. 10. 13

When Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, after a victorious reigne of one and forty yeeres, had ended his life; it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his sonne, should forthwith haue been admitted, to reign in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needes haue appeared base; and the vertue of the last king, hauing beene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty yeeres did passe, before Zacharia the sonne of Ieroboam was, by vniforme consent, receiued as king. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to haue beene wanting, vpon which, the wisdome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the army (who afterwards slew one another, so fast, that in fourteen yeers there reigned fiue kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdome asunder; holding each what hee could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeers, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the son of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three & twenty yeeres, we find by the difference of time, between the fifteenth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seauen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last sixe moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeede, that by supposing Ieroboam to haue reigned with his father eleauen yeeres, do cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abridge this Anarchie, that was before the reigne of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leaue it twelue yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered, than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtful coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fifty yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Reign vnto his owne; which was it selfe indeed so long, that hee may well seeme to haue begun it very young: for I do not think, that God blessed this Idolater, both with a longer reign, and with a longer life, than he did his seruant Dauid.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the Throne of Israel was voyde, before the reigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to bee said of his Reigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely vvas hee king; in vvhich time he declared himselfe a vvorshipper of the golden Calues; vvhich vvas enough to iustifie the iudgement of God, vvhereby hee vvas slaine. Hee vvas the last of Iehu's house, being (inclusiuely) the first of that line; vvhich may haue beene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophecie hauing determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant giuen to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene giuen to Iehu, for the slaughter of Iehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia, hauing beene sixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who reigned
2 King. 15. 13. after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not finde; saue onely that he was a Traytor, and the sonne of one Iabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought easily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Iehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong party: for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum receiued the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphsah, and all that were therin, or therabouts, but he ript vp all their women with childe, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been vsed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that he would haue been as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that we may plainly discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other priuate passions, to haue been the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Reigne, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeased, with a thousand talents of siluer, leuied vpon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) hauing either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) sought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill beloued King. Iosephus reports of this Menahem, that his Reigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for he reigned onely two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the sonne of Remalia, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shalbe.
Ios. ibid. There needes no more to be said of Menahem, and his sonne, saue that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the sonne (as we finde in Iosephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened vnto those Northern Nations the way into Palæstina; it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belesus (called also Beleses, and by some, Phul Belochus) who ioyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-liued the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Vzzia his Reigne and Life.

AS the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserue the linage of Dauid, in the person of Ioas; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and aduance him to the Crown of Iuda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazia, had endangered his succession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he sought God in the daies of Zecharia (which vnderstood the visions of God) and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.
2 Chro. 26. 5.

Verse 16. But, when hee was strong, his heart was lifted vp to his destruction: for hee transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, vpon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in euery extremity been so helpefull to the kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should haue held backe Vzzia from incroching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoeuer, the king forgot his duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the kings purpose, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their their whole was shewed only in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his duty) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that he discerned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Iosephus, indeede inlargeth the Story, by inserting a great Earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs; till it rested against another Hill, stopping vp the high-wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roofe of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may haue beene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misereckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seuen and thirty yeeres before Vzzia; so that Iotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue beene then vnborne: for he was but fiue and twenty yeeres old, when he began to reigne as King. Therefore, thus farre only we haue assurance; that while Vzzia was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose vp in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was causeld, in all haste, to depart the place, and to liue in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because hee was a Leper.

Ioseph. ant. l. 9. c. 11.

2. Chro. 26. 20.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which liued in the time of Vzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioel, Amos. Obadia and Ionas. It is not indeede set downe, when Ioel or Obadia did prophecie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be iudged contemporary with Hosea and Amos, who liued vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these fiue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer liued, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehension; how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquity of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to haue prophecied in the dayes of Ioas, whilest the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason vnto some very learned, to haue belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Nineue was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

2. Chron. 14. v. 25. 26.

In the reigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the foure great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they haue left written (as S. Augustine giues reason of the distinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esay was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobility, (for their opinion is reiected, who thinke him to haue beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he liued; but for the excellency, both of his stile & argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole History of our Sauiour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; hauing written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an History of matters already past.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. l. 18. c. 29.

Hier. in præf. super Isaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeere of his Reigne, by our computation (whereof in due place we will giue reason) was current, when Vezia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Asychis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt, vnto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Crowne sixe yeeres. Then Sabacon, an Aethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty yeeres, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Vezia his Reigne and life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the busines of Iuda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Ariphron his twenty, the seuen and twentieth of Thespieus, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Æschylus his three and twenty, made euen with the two and fifty of Vezia: as likewise did in Alba the last seuen of Siluius Auentinus his seuen and thirty, together with the three and twenty of Siluius Proca, and two and twenty the first of Siluius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new Kingdome, in the first of Vezia, wherein, after eight and twenty yeeres, his Sonne Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the diuision of the Assyrian Empire, betweene him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it conuenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertainty in the Story of the Assyrian kings, who haue already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IIII.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundry Families, that reigned a-part in Nineue and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselues in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be iudged by him; receiuing by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited liues. The first example of this his power, was showne vpon Belsus the Babylonian, by whose especiall aduice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might giue offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generality of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he vsed the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne grace; allowing him to hold, not onely the City and Prouince of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezelling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) onely the Soueraignty to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the City of Nineue, permitting the Citizens neuertheless to take and carry away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that ioyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slacking too much the reines of his owne Soueraignty, hee did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde in the Scriptures to haue held some Townes of the Medes; and the ciuill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselues were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that gouernment, by reducing them into stricter tearmes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to be such, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of Israel, & teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineue, & subuersion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, vnder Arbaces, had the honor, who may seeme at that time to haue kept the Assyrians vnder their subiection, when the rest of the Prouinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselues, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made vncertaine.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally receiued, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the obiections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Ioseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the iudgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a-part the seuerall authorities & arguments of sundry men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partiality, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancy of mine owne, but meerely led by those reasons which vpon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as currant, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Army; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Assyria: finally, that he reigned eight and forty yeers, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalassar his Sonne, in whose Posterity it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach preuailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainsaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptory herein. But, howsoeuer Annius his Authors deserue to bee suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, iustifie it by diuers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no History at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belosus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who ioyned with them, were thought well rewarded with liberty, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any History. And certainely it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparant, that the destruction of Nineue by Arbaces, & the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe from aspiring to recouer the Soueraignty, which else they would haue thought to belong, as of right, vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolue the Corporation, or Body politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouer-dangerous, euen to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their Kingdome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul haue beene (of whose deseruings, or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in diuision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belosus; whose neer Neighbourhood gaue him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his owne game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should haue attempted to seize vpon it. The Prouince of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and siluer that had bin in the Palace of Nineue. And questionlesse to restore such a City as Nineue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such meanes as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to haue wanted.

Herodot. l. 1.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not haue beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Army, seeking booty afarre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers haue called Belosus, Beleses, and Belestis, (in like manner as Iosephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called neuer otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Astiages, and called of the Greekes by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple vtterly remoued. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border vpon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus hauing setled his affaires in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leisure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde euery one circumstance concurring, to proue that Phul who inuaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who ioyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was ouerthrowne, did enter into that action, meerely for the loue of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euphrates with an Army into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Prouince, adioyning to their barraine quarters, might yeerely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not onely likely to haue quiet passage through their borders, but their vtmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe haue giuen him intelligence, of the destruction and ciuill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heauie neighbour of Ieroboam, recouered their owne, setting vp a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither vvas it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, diuided by Euphrates, hold together in so good tearmes of friendship: it was ancient consanguinity; the memory whereof was auailable to the Syrians, in the time of Dauid, when the Aramites beyond the Riuer came ouer willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning so farre off as Nineue, should haue to doe in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it vvere hard to shew.

Ioseph. ant. l. 10. cap. 12.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that vvas in the tenne Tribes. For if the Crowne of Israel vvere worne by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belosus was either vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was fairest, and first discouered. This might haue compelled those, vvho alone vvere not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, vvould be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did passe the riuer of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous iourney, then may it seeme that the inter-regnum in Israel vvas not so long as we haue made it: for three and twenty yeers leisure would haue afforded better opportunity, which ought not to haue been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius haue written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now, though it bee held an errour of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concurre, that the authority of Arbaces did restraine the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some haue coniectured that all Assyria was giuen to Belosus (as an ouerplus, besides the Prouince of Babylon vvhich vvas his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in regard of his high desertings; yet the opinion more commonly receiued, is, that hee did onely encroach vpon that Prouince by little and little, whilest Arbaces liued, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelue yeeres betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belosus occupyed, besides the restauration of Nineue, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Reigne, if perhaps he liued to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather serue to proue that Phul and Belosus were one person; forasmuch as the iourney of Phul against Israel was not made vntill Belosus could finde leisure; & the time of aduantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Prouince of which Phul is called King. Briefely, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrey so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to haue been, at least, named in some Historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to haue beene spoken of for those victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoeuer of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we finde good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and infortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine & vtter desolation of Nineue, must needes haue so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty yeeres space be able to inuade Palestina, which the ancient Kings, reigning in Nineue, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belosus to subdue it; who hauing once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Country, secure of the Scythians, & other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, where into ciuill dissention of the inhabitants, & the bordering enuy of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and Cousins to the Chaldaans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alleadged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belosus; euen as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artashasht, and Ahasuerosh, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their owne Countries, haue called Nabopollassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of old, nor needs to trouble our selues and others with framing new coniectures. This in effect is that, which they alleadge in maintenance of the opinion commonly receiued.

Now this being once granted; other things of more importance will of themselues easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belosus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollassar (famous for the Astronomicall obseruations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belosus or Belesis were that Phul which inuaded Israel, if he and his posterity reigned both in Nineue & in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whom Salmanasar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanasar, who is knowne to haue reigned in those yeares which Ptolomy the Mathematician hath assigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Mecedach, who supplanted Asar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such coniectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, vpon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar, that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were seuerall Kings. This consequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworne to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proued by his name, which is meerely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassars name, is proper to the Assyrians.

It is likewise proued by the Astronomicall obseruations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolomy drawes that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esay his Esay 39. 1. prophesie, Merodath, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodath, the sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar; which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carried captiue some part of the ten Tribes; it may wel be granted, that in the Prouince of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign ouer Babylon in the sixt yeare of Hezekia, at which time Salmanassar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea & Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Ioseph Scaliger; vvho not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the prouing that Phul and Belosus were not sundry Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that haue spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might haue won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, giuen such offence, that men refused thereupon to read their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine owne part, howsoeuer I beleeue nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stampe affirme, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellowes alleadged in it: I haue (somewhat peraduenture too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Neuertheless, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere vve finde, and seeketh to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger tearmes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellowes) who set downe the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belosus, and Salmanassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should bee ashamed or vnwilling to reade. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores, vvith the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men herably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or auoided. It vvill easily bee granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he vvas not King of Assyria, some men doubt whether Scaliger's reasons bee enough to proue. For though Nabonassar bee a Chaldean name, and Salmanassar an Assyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two seuerall names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonassar either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe cals them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarium Scal. Canon. l. 3. Babylonium fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleepe haue dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonassar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negatiue. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldeans, doth not proue him to haue beene learned in their sciences; so doth it not proue him, not to haue beene also King of Assyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all

Sciences,

Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subiects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then liuing in Spaine, if Spaine at that time had any; yet I thinke, Posterity will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine vvas none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar, did vse the Assyrian Souldiers, & Babylonian Schollers: but it seemes, that hee and his posterity, by giuing themselues wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise king Philip lost partly, & partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two vn-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleadged on the contrary side) one of them vvhich is drawne from the vnlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man vvill dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Prouince of Babylon, yet not king of Babylon it selfe: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing saue coniecture. But in that which is alleadged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the sonne of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokempadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reigne in the sixt yeare of Hezekia, I finde matter of more difficulty, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these obiections vntill I meet with their subiect in his proper place; vvhich will bee vvhen wee come to the time of Hezekia, vvherein Merodach liued and vvas King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre vvill I heere satisfie him; that how strong soeuer this argument may seeme, Scaliger himselfe did liue to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceiued.

Now therefore let vs consider, in what sort they haue fashioned their Story, vvho taking Pul to bee a distinct person from Belosus or Belestis, haue in like sort, as was necessary, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Asarhaddon, vvhich left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And heere I must first confesse my vvant of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that haue gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the body of this History, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, whom I haue seene, that since Ioseph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, haue written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calusius himselfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been carefull to giue vs notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulassar, did reigne; (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set downe Baladan, for the same person vvith Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe reuoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these diuided Kingdomes, in such sort as I find it contriued by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I haue seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posterity, of vvhom hee hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last yeare; he appeares to me a man of a curious industry, sound iudgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath receiued good information, and enriched his vvorkes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, vvithout wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to haue receiued benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would he haue instructed and emboldned me, to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, which now I haue not leisure to reuise. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared lest it had ouer-hastily passed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vally of Siddim, and were slaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I haue done, to say, that they may probably bee thought to haue beene some petty Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let vs consider C. 1. §. 13.

how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mighty, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belesus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belesus, and they two preuailed so farre, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a diuision thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, between Octauian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another coniecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainety) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Media, appointing Belesus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in foure yeeres, it came to passe, by the iust iudgement of God, that Phul and Belesus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being his Vice-Royes, made themselues absolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Torniellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resoluing to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Hauing thus deuised, how Phul and Belesus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, he orders their time, and their successors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul begins to reigne, and continues eight and forty years. Theglathphalasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diuersly, according as the Authors whom I haue in hand are pleased to diuersifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned tenne. After him Senacherib reigned seuen: and when he was slaine, Asarhaddon his sonne ten yeares; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assyria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had beene more likely) Belesus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight yeeres; at the least threescore and eight yeeres did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinkes to be Baladan, are assigned sixe and twenty yeares: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabolassar, the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truely say, That the coniectures of other men, who giue all to Belesus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Torniellus would haue conceiued two different waies, by which Phul might haue gotten Assyria (for how Belesus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could haue contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceiued, that to make Phul on the suddain King of Assyria; or to giue him so noble a Prouince, as would, of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to haue happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he deuised the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul, being one of the three that diuided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians: yea, why this Diuision it selfe, and the ciuill Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of? Questionlesse, the interuerting of some Treasures by Belesus, with his Iudgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconueniences can this way be auoyded; but that eyther we must confesse, the Dominion giuen to Phul to haue beene exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to haue beene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs think, that rather the coniecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belesus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeares, as might serue to hold out in rebellion: for Belesus it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer-great fauourer of liberty) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Gouernment, to doe what they listed.

But

But it is now fit that wee peruſe the Catalogue of theſe Kings, not paſſing through them all (for ſome will requife a large diſcourſe in their owne times) but ſpeaking of their order and time in generall. If it be ſo vnlawfull to thinke, that ſome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors aſwell as in his) may be true, eſpecially ſuch as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood; why then is it ſaid, that Phul did reigne in Aſſyria eight and forty yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and iudicious Writers haue found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the courſe of things in Hiſtory: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the puniſhment of Annius his forgery (as queſtionleſſe he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probability, he be not beleeued for his owne ſake; though for our owne ſakes wee make vſe of his boldneſſe, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing elſe being offered) we are vnwilling our ſelues to be Authors of new, though not vnprofitable coniectures. Heerein we ſhall haue this commodity, that we may without bluſhing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, againſt whom vve ſhall be ſure to finde friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalaſar and Salmanaſſar did reach, by Annius his meaſure, to the length of fiue and twenty yeeres the one, and ſeuenteene the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and ſeuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his own computation; vſing the liberty whereof I ſpake laſt: for that any Author, ſaue our good Metaſthenes, or thoſe that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of theſe did reigne, it is more than I haue yet found. To Senacherib and Aſarhaddon, Torniellus giues the ſame length of reigne, vvhich is found in Metaſthenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate ſo much vnto themſelues, as may very well bee allowed vnto a man ſo iudicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wiſh that hee had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this buſineſſe, wherein hee himſelfe hath choſen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to ſay, as elſe he muſt haue done, almoſt nothing.

The like liberty we finde that he hath vſed in meaſuring the reignes of the Chaldeans; filling vp all the ſpace betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning of Nabonaſſar, with the threeſcore and eight yeares of Beloſus. In this reſpect it was, perhaps, that he thought Beloſus might haue begun his reign ſomewhat later than Phul: for threeſcore and eight yeares would ſeem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke poſſeſſion of it. But how is any vvhit of his age abated by ſhortning his reigne, ſeeing his life reacheth to the end of ſuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a priuate man, enough for a long liuer? Indeed, eight and forty yeares had been ſomewhat of the moſt, conſidering that he ſeemes by the ſtory to haue beene little leſſe, at ſuch time as he ioyned with Arbaces; and therfore the addition of twenty years, did well deſerue that note (which Torniellus aduiſedly giues) that if his reigne extended not ſo far, then the reigne of ſuch as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto Nabonaſſar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldneſſe of Torniellus, in coniecturing, nor the modeſty of Scaliger and Sethus Caluiſius, in forbearing to ſet downe as warrantable, ſuch things as depend only vpon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquity, muſt be deſcribed in Hiſtory, as Geographers in their Maps deſcribe thoſe Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true diſcouery, that is, either by leauing ſome part blanke, or by inſerting the Land of Pigmies, Rockes of loade-ſtone with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from diſtance of place, allowes not ſuch liberty to a Deſcriber, as that which ariſeth from the remedileſſe oblivion of conſuming time. For it is true that the Poet ſaith;

——Neq; feruidis
Parsinclusa caloribus
Mundi, nec Boreæ finitimum latus,
Durat aq; ſole Niues,
Mercatorem abigunt: horrida callidi
Vincunt æquora Nautæ.

Not

Nor Southerne heate, nor Mortherne ſnow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The ſubiect Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The ſubtile Shipmen way will finde,
Storme neuer ſo the Seas with Winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called coniectures) painted in Maps, doe ſerue only to miſ-lead ſuch diſcouerers as raſhly beleeue them; drawing vpon the publiſhers, either ſome angry curſes, or well deſerued ſcorne; but, to keepe their owne credit, they cannot ſerue alwaies. To which purpoſe I remember a prety ieſt of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spaniſh Gentleman, who had beene employed by his King in planting a Colony vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, being then my Priſoner, ſome queſtion about an Iſland in thoſe Streights, which, mee thought, might haue done either benefit or diſpleaſure to his enterpriſe, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wiues Iſland; ſaying, That whileſt the fellow drew that Map, his wife ſitting by, deſired to put in one Countrey for her; that ſhe, in imagination, might haue an Iſland of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Hiſtories, wee need not be ſo ſcrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time ſhould runne backward, and by reſtoring the things themſelues to knowledge, make our coniectures appeare ridiculous: What if ſome good Copy of an ancient Author could be found, ſhewing (if we haue it not already) the perfect truth of theſe vncertainties? would it bee more ſhame to haue beleeued in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to haue beleeued nothing? Heere I will not ſay, that the credit, which wee giue to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be giuen to one of thoſe Authors whoſe names he pretendeth. Let it ſuffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather truſt Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius, yet him than them, if his aſſertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approued Hiſtories than their coniecture, as in this point it ſeemes to me; it hauing moreouer gotten ſome credit, by the approbation of many, and thoſe not meanly learned.

To end this tedious diſputation; I hold it a ſure courſe in examination of ſuch opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, ſo to deale as Pacuuius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them deſirous to put all the Senatours of the City to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-houſe, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them ſhould periſh, vntill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was haſty; for as faſt as euery name was read, all the town cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leiſure; for in ſubſtituting of another, ſome notorious vice of the Perſon, or baſeneſſe of his condition, or inſufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered, to be reiected: ſo that finding the worſe and leſſe choice, the further and the more that they ſought, it was finally agreed, that the old ſhould be kept for lacke of better.

§. V.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this diuiſion of the Aſſyrian Empire, followes the inſtauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reigne of the ſame King Vzzia, and in his one and fiftieth yeere. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that theſe games were eſtabliſhed by Iphitus in the firſt of Iotham: yet is not that opinion ſo generall, but that Authors, weighty enough, haue giuen to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting thoſe things vnto the ſacred Hiſtory, which are found in prophane Authors, wee ſhould not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to thoſe workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that ſetting in due order theſe beginnings of accompts, we ioyne them to matters of Iſrael and Iuda, where occaſion requires.

Theſe Olympian games and exerciſes of actiuity, were firſt inſtituted by Hercules, who meaſured the length of the race by his owne foote; by which Pythagoras found out the ſtature and likely ſtrength of Hercules his body. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the City Olympia, otherwiſe Piſa, neere vnto Elis; where alſo

Iupiter

Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. Theſe games were exerciſed from euery fourth yeere compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a City of Peloponneſus, neere the riuer Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, theſe meetings were diſcontinued for many yeeres, till Aul. Gell. l. 1. c. 1. Iphitus, by aduice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-eſtabliſhed them, Licurgus the Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodoſius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: others thinke that they were diſſolued vnder Conſtantine the Great. ex Plut. Plut out of Hermippus.

From this inſtitution, Varro accompted the Grecian times, and their ſtories, to be certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Pliny giues little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, as Euſebius out of Diodore, Caſtor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whoſe time the ſeuen wiſe Grecians flouriſhed. For Solon had ſpeech with Craeſus, and Craeſus was ouerthrowne and taken by Cyrus. Plin. l. 36. c. 4.

Many patient and piercing braines haue laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of theſe Olympiads, namely, to ſet them in the true yeere of the World, and the reigne of ſuch and ſuch Kings: but ſeeing they all differ in the firſt accompt, that is, of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly iump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril againſt Iulian and Didymus, begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Oſias, or Azariah.

Euſebius, who is contrary to himſelfe in this reckoning, accounts with thoſe that find the very firſt Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and ſixth yeere after Troy, yet her telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeere of Vzzia, which is (as I finde it) two yeeres later. Euſeb. de Prep. Euang. l. 10. c. 3.

Eratoſthenes placeth the firſt Olympiad foure hundred and ſeuen yeeres after Troy, reckoning the yeeres that paſſed betweene; to whom Dionyſius Halicarnaſſaus, Diodorus Siculus, Iolinus, and many others adhere. Eratoſth. apud Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1.

The diſtance betweene the deſtruction of Troy, and the firſt Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratoſthenes. From the taking of Troy, to the deſcent of Hercules his Poſterity into Peloponneſus, were foureſcore yeeres; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeſcore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his gouernment in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the firſt Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeeres. In this account the firſt yeare of the firſt Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to ſeeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it ſuffice, that by knowing the inſtauration of theſe games, to haue been in the foure hundreth and eight yeere current after Troy, wee may reckon backe to the taking of that City, ſetting that, and other accidents, which haue reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads, muſt needs teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vſe, we haue the enſuing yeeres, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus diuided by the ſame Eratoſthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paſſage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth foureſcore and ſeuenteene yeares; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warre, eight and forty yeares; forwards to the victory of Lyſander, ſeuen and twenty; to the battaile of Leuctra, thirty foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, fiue and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelue. The whole ſumme ariſeth to 453. yeares; which number he otherwiſe alſo collecteth, and it is allowed by the moſt.

Now for placing the inſtitution of the Olympiads in the one & fiftieth yeere of Vzzia, we haue arguments grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reigne, and the death of Alexander; as alſo vpon the Aſtronomicall calculation of ſundry Eclipſes of the Sunne; as of that which happened when Xerxes ſet out of Sardis with his Army to inuade Greece; and of diuers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King, before he was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the firſt yeere of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty yeeres: they who giue him but twenty nine yeeres of reigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iuſtine, Euſebius, and others) begin a yeere later, which comes all Tul. de Diu. l. 1. Iuſt. l. 1. Euſeb. de Prep. Euang. l. 10. c. 3. & de Dem. Euang. l. 8. c. 2.

all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers, in the first yeer of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serueth well to leade vs backe to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like obseruations do. For if wee reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first yeer of the fine and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, wee finde two hundred and thirty yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeers, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first yeer of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeere from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seuenty yeers of the captiuity of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon backe those seuenty yeers, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed vnder the Kings of Iuda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzziah, as we haue already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundreth threescore, and seuenth yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leades vs back vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we haue a faire way through the threescore and ten yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrastling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastery in those feates, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises, that serued onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselues excellent in any laudable quality, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of hauing plaid the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose iustice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards giuen to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commodity following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seene his three sonnes crowned for their seuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cœlum ascensurus es; that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not clime vp to heauen: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speakes of these Victors, calling them,

Horat. Carm. Lq. Od. 2.

Quos Elea domum reducit
Palma cœlestes:

Such as like heauenly wights doe come
With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but euen graue Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour, to haue wonne the Victory at Running or Wrastling in those games, as to haue triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conquest of a Prouince.

Tull. in Orat. pro Flacco.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæon, which doth answer to our Iune; and what means they vsed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I haue shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Iuda, & leaue the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§. VI.

Of Iotham and his Contemporaries.

Iotham the sonne of Vzziah, when he was fiue and twenty yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Ierusalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides diuers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forrests, Towers and Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Siluer an hundreth talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: he reigned sixe and twentie yeares: of whom Iosephus giues this testimonie: Eiusmodi verò Princeps hic fuit, vt nullum in eo virtutis genus desiderares: vt qui Deum adeo piè coluerit, hominibus suis adeo iustè præfuerit, vrbem ipsam tanta sibi curâ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, vt vniuersum regnum hostibus quidem minimè contemnendum, domesticis autem viris modis atque ciuibus fœlix, fœcundum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; Thus was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, he gouerned his men so righteously, he was so prouident for the Citie, and did so greatly enlarge it, that by his vertue and prowesse he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Seruants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happie. 2 *King.*15.33.

This is all that I find of Iotham: his reigne was not long, but as happie in all things, as he himselfe was deuout and vertuous.

Archomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacida, to the time of Cypselus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King therof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, and carried the inhabitants captiue. This Tiglath reigned fiue and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeares longer: which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reigne, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned 27. yeares 2 *King.*15.

Aleschylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. years. Alcamenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. years, and out-liued the Messeniack warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion. *Paus.*13.

At this time liued Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the Citie of Nineue; which succeeded (saith Iosephus) a hundred & fifteen yeares after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Ahu, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seuenteenth yeere of Peka, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reigne, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predeceſſors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his ſon for ſacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was repreſented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, ſet vp not far from Ieruſalem, in a Valley ſhadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vſed for Hell. The children offered, were incloſed within the carkaſſe of this Idoll, and as the fire encreaſed, ſo the ſacrificers, with a noyſe of Cimbals and other Inſtruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnaturall, cruell, and diuelliſh Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which Saint Hierome vpon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible ſinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was alſo practiſed elſewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudea, diuers Authors witneſſe; as Virgil in the ſecond of Aeneis, —— Sanguine placatis, &c. and Silius, —— Poſcere cæde Deos. Saturne is ſaid to haue brought this cuſtome into Italie, beſides the caſting of many ſoules into the Riuer of Tyber, inſtead of which, Herculus commanded, that the waxen Images of men ſhould be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill alſo taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, inſomuch, that when their Citie was beſieged, and in diſtreſſe, the Prieſt made them beleeue, that becauſe they had ſpared their own children, and had bought and brought vp others to be offered, that therefore Saturne had ſtirred vp, and ſtrengthened their Enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their Citie to be ſlaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe forenamed Nations, had inſtructed the Rhodians, the people of Creta, and Chios, of Meſſena, of Galatia, with the Maſſagets, and others, in theſe his ſeruices. Further, as if he were not content to deſtroy the ſoules of many Nations in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, (as Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill vnder this fearefull ſeruitude, in which hee alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedneſſe of this King Ahaz, God ſtirred vp Rezin of Damaſcus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Iſrael againſt him, who inuaded Iudea, and beſieged Ieruſalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Iewes out of it; and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thouſand Iudeans, of the ableſt of the kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Sonne of Achaz was alſo ſlaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his houſe, and Elcanath the ſecond perſon vnto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women & children, the Iſraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counſell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliuered backe againe. 2 Chron. 28. 6.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Iuda on the North; ſo the Edomites and the Philiſtims, who euermore attended the ruine of Iudea, entred vpon them from the South, and tooke Bethſemes, Aialon, Gadereth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, ſlew many people, & carried away many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelfe enuironed on all ſides, & that his Idols and dead gods gaue him no comfort, he ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglatphileſer, to deſire ſome aide from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſiluer and gold both of the Temple, and Kings Houſe. 2 Chron. 28. 2 King. 16.

Tiglatphileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that roſe in Paleſtina. His Father hauing lately made himſelfe from a Prouinciall Lieutenant, king of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudea, inuited by Menahem, king of Iſrael. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himſelfe, he was content to aſſigne ſome other time forgoing through with this enterprize: becauſe (as I haue ſaid before) he was not firmely ſetled at home, and the Syrian kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, hauing now, with the treaſures of Ieruſalem, prepared his Armie, firſt inuaded the Territorie of Damaſcus, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with Dauid, & ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, ſent it to Vriah the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Ieruſalem, whereon at his returne he burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and and the rest beyond Iordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the Riuer, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, inuaded Ephraim, and the kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that he was inuited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he possest himself of the greater part of Iuda, and as it seemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he reuolted from Assur, or rebelled against him, and therfore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died, but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the kings of Iuda.

With Ahaz liued Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who gouerned 40 yeares, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Cteſias find Anticaramus in stead of this Medidus, to haue beene Sosarmus his Succeſſor, to whom they giue 30 yeares. Eusebius in Chro.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the reigne of Ahaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seeme to haue reigned with him some part of the time. For we find that Ahaz did send vnto the Kings of Ashur to helpe him. The Geneua note saies, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither find any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath beene said before: though how long he reigned with his Father, it had beene hard to define. 2 King 28. 16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedemon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then ioynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeare, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their kings, nothing being done without their aduice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their kings, as the Romain Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Ahaz died Æschylus, who had ruled in Athens euer since the fiftieth yeare of Vzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontidæ, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Æschylus, and was the last of their Gouernors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from kings (after Codrus) to Gouernors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kinde of Burghmaster, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeares. Plut. in vita Solo.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Booke begins in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnassæus in the first of the seuenth Olympiad: at which time indeed, Coroys the first of these, began his ten yeares rule.

The kingdome of the Latines, gouerned about three hundred yeare by the Sylui, of the race of Æneas, tooke end in the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome, being laide by Romulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the same king. Codoman builds it in the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should; others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeare of the seuenth: who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to haue kept herein the best accompt.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Antiquities of Italie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

AND here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations possest it before the arriuall of Æneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs: the rather because much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by diuers names: as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnasseus thinkes to haue beene the first, that brought a Colonie of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere gleba:
Oenotrij coluêre viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Hesperia name,
Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie:
Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame,
That by late ages of Posteritie,
Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or king may haue bin, it is very vncertaine. For Virgil speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued so long vpon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to find out the originall of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painfull search, and not improble coniecture. And first of all he grounds vpon that of Halicarnasseus, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was giuen to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustine, who saith, that Brundusium was a Colonie of the Ætolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirmes the same of Temesa or Tempsa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, vpon the authoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was deriued ouer all. Concerning that which is said of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall, from them he brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, saue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke words is common; and the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Æthalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Ætholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Æolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Ætolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnasseus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach.

Halicarn.l.1.
Plin.l.3.c.5.

Heereunto appertaines that of Iulian the Apostata, who called the Greekes cousins of the Latines. Also the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Ianan; and the Fable of Ianus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Ianan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who sayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lies betweene Ætolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, easily disproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moses: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the son of Iauan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldest son of Noah: which antiquity far exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewise Virgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie, but calleth Electra & her sister Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not haue done, had Atlas and Italus beene one person.

As for the authoritie of Berosus in this case, we need the lesse to regard it, for that Reyneccius himselfe, whose coniectures are more to be valued than the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the verses of Virgil last rehearsed, wherein he would not haue said, ——Nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But seeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeares before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Ætolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pausanias teach) then the name of Italie began: & seeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italus was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not that I haue read of any such Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Ætolus written in Greeke Aitolus, was very famous among the Ætolians, and among the Eleans, he being son of a King of Elis, and founder of the Ætolian Kingdome. Neyther is it more hard to deriue the name of Italus from Ætolus, than Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils authoritie stand well with the collections of Reyneccius; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which hee and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians hauing held the greatest part of it vnder their subiection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnassæus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to haue bin Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other significations that are strained) imports as much as original, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are known in vanting manner to haue alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moone; because indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their seates so oft as other Greekes were, who did dwell without that halfe Iland, neyther had the Arcadians so vnsure a dwelling as the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Country was lesse fruitfull in land, mountainous, and hard of accesse, & they themselues (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of these therefore hauing occupied a great part of Latium, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselues Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours there by had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt somwhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should haue bin Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforced the superfluous companie to seeke another seat, & that some expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Euander, into the same parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, vvho sometimes gaue name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne vvas brought to some ciuiltie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Stercutius, others terme him Sterutius, and say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to think that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should be hard to find one Countrie or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which eyther by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage ouer a Riuer in Hell, because death is a passage to another life; and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the Riuer Styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greek λαοὶ people, and λᾶες stones, are neere in sound, therefore they fained in the time of Deucalion stones conuerted into men, as at other times men into stones:) in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturnus hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus absconsus es. For it cannot be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also haue this very signification, if it be deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

See lib. 1. cap. 6. §. 1. & seq.

Esay 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth coniecture that the Cateans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Iauan, vvere the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subiects to the Crowne of Troy. Heereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Æolians held in Asia, called Elaa, or Elaia, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (Θ) hauing (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakenesse of vtterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Citim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Pregenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaiter, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Ætolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Æolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaus, the Hauen Elaas, the people Elaita, the Citie Elaus, Elaia, and Elateia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from vvhence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Ceteans and Arcadians, had their original from Cethim it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriuing the Sabines from him) giue the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia) be named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius pursuing this likelihood, thinkes, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat vpon Auge, the daughter of Aleus king of Arcadia) was slaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what euill might befall themselues by the Greeks, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius further thinkes, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatius, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may haue bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas king of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betweene these two Families the succession in that kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippothous of the race of Elatus, in whose Postetitie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name of Latinus, hauing a deriuatiue sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the coniecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparant truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, vvhich haue vvritten the originals of Latium.

§. III.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines vntill Æneas his comming.

THe kings which reigned in Latium before the arriuall of Æneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, saue what is mentioned already, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to iudge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Κρονος, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he liued, may very well admint him to haue bin the same: but the names of * Stercus, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not borrowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the soyle which they laid on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to haue growne from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or diuination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father. He gaue to Euander the Arcadian (who hauing slaine by mischance his Father Echemus king of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the sister of Faunus, who was also his Wife as all Historians agree; she was held a Prophetesse, & highly commended for her chastitie; which praise in her must needs haue bin much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being meerly incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any childe, neither doe we reade of any other Wife which he had, saue onely that Virgil giues vnto him Latinus as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, saue only that her aboad was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturnæ.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that his name was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Casi, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the son of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinus hauing obtained the succession in that kingdome after Faunus, did promise his onely Daughter and Heire Lauinia, to Turnus the son of Venilia, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Æneas arriued in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked according to the rate vvhich Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then vsed, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued vvith the great reputation of Æneas, vvhich himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed here-

* Ezekiel often calls the Idols of the heathen dees stercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Euangelist we reade of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus stercoreus: and it may be that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should sticke vnto him. Aeneid. 7.

Suidas in the word Latini.

herewith, sought to auenge himselfe by warre: which vvas soone ended vvith his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not haue borne a Daughter marriageable at the arriuall of Æneas; vnlesse we should vvholly follow Suidas, and rather giue the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, vvho serued in the last yeare of the Troian Warre. But Reynecius holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauinia vvas borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, vvas not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; vvho calleth her Palatia: vvhich name very vvell might be deriued from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by vvhich the High Priest called euery Virgin whom he tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vesta; vvherfore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoeuer Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being giuen in marriage to Æneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherin it continued vntill it vvas ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IIII.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Gouernors of Alba.

ÆNeas himselfe being of the royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his vvife Crensa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius; vvhose surname vvas Iulus, hauing before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin surnamed Ilus. But when Æneas vvas dead, his vvife Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great vvith child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was deliuered of a son, called thereupon Syluius, & surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, & vsing her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Syluius. Yet afterwards, whether to auoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leauing to his mother in law the Citie Lauinium, which Æneas had built and called after his new wiues name, founded the Cite Alba Longa, & therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight & twentie years: Virgil giues him thirtie; others fiue and thirty, & eight and thirty. After his deceasse, there arose contention betweene Syluius, the son of Æneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enioyed, leauing the Kingdome to Syluius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterwards called Syluij.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I find thus set downe:

1	Syluius Posthumus.	29
2	Syluius Æneas.	31
3	Syluius Latinus.	50
4	Syluius Alba.	39

Syluius Numitor.

Ilia, called also Rhea and Syluia.

Romulus. Remus.

The

The most of these Kings liued in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisce Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the Riuer Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil giues it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Æneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus king of the Albanes: who was buried therin: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Iulius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus who leauing Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was depriued of his kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Ægesthus was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceiued two sonnes, either by her Vncle Amulius, as some thinke, or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Vncle commanded to be drowned, & the mother buried quicke, according to the law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserued, who afterward reuenged the cruelty of their Vncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the kingdome: wherein how long he reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to liue in Rome; and of the Line of Syluius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, king of the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Sufferius, the successor of Cluilius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazzard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quarrell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatij, the Campions of the Romanes, preuailed against the Curiatij, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to such an ouerthrow, as might make them weake enough for the Albanes to deale with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among vvhich vvere the Iulij: of vvhom C. Iulius Cæsar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full assembly of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and iudgement, obtained the Soueraigntie of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Æneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so reuiued, that seldome, if euer, any one Familie hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, vvhich deuoured the Alban kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-childe of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, hauing beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius stius Cato, Calpharnius Piso, Sempronius, & others, seeke to deriue the Romans from Ianus: but Herodotus, Marsylus, and many others of equall credit, giue the Grecians for their ancestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Booke, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor ex argumento colligit, Romam à Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto, Herculi rem sacram faciunt, matrem quoque Euandri venerantur Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance doe sacrifice to Hercules: the Romanes also worship the mother of Euander.

Strab. l. 5. f. 159.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembred many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the son of Vlysses and Circe; Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, saying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraclides giues the denomination to a captiue Lady, brought thither by the Grecians: others say, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Liuie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation: of whom and his conforts, Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

At tamen vt longe repetas, longeque reuoluas
Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbeare.

meaning, either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preseruation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father, that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour, to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me that he might haue two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he iniuriously held the kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merouée, king of the Franes, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Pauchet sayes, Let them beleeue it that list: Ile croire qui voudra: Also of Alexander, and of *Scipio Africa*n, there are poeticall inuentions: but to answer these imaginations in generall, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to be forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had beene rauished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that he had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was ouercome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouée might fancie a Sea Captaine, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Æneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfes, qua nunc (saith Halicarnassæus) honestiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: so was it said that Æneas vanished away by the Riuer Numicus: but but thereof Liuie alſo ſpeaketh modeſtly; for he rehearſeth the other opinion that the ſtorme was the furie of the Senators, but ſeemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree, that there was an vnnaturall darkeneſſe, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might be ſlaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anaſtaſius was ſlaine with lightning; ſo was Strabo the Father of Pompey ſlaine with a thunder-bolt: ſo Carus the Emperour (who ſucceeded Probus) whileſt he lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tygru, was there ſlain with lightning. But a Mars of the ſame kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, & by violence deſtroyed. And that he died by violence (which deſtinie followed moſt of the Roman Emperors) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the ſeuenth king after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that he ſhould not be buried, for (ſaid he) Romulus himſelfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnaſſeus end this diſpute: whoſe words are theſe: They (ſaith he) who drew neereſt to the truth, ſay that he was ſlaine by his owne Citizens; and that his cruelties in puniſhment of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cauſe of his ſlaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was rauiſhed, whether by ſome man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipſed, and all the earth couered with darkeneſſe like vnto night, & that the ſame did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whoſe life hiſtorified by Plutarch, doth containe (beſides what is here already ſpoken of him) the conqueſt of a few miles which had ſoone bin forgotten, if the Roman greatneſſe built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very ſtrong of bodie, patient of trauell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vſe of wine & delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which cauſed him to ſlay his brother, & neglect to reuenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himſelfe might be Lord alone in thoſe narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeers firſt alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, ſingle, till he was ſlaine, as is alreadie ſhewed: after which time, the Soueraignty fel into the hands of Numa, a man to him vnknown, & more Prieſt-like than King-like: wherein Rome it ſelfe in her later times hath ſomewhat reſembled this King. For hauing long bin ſole Gouerneſſe till Conſtantinople ſhared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was cruſhed by forraine enemies, and the Latines diſpoyled of Imperiall power, ſhe fell into the ſubiection of a Prelate, ſwelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, & therewith victorious to exceſſiue magnificence, from whence by the ſame degrees it fell, being driuen from luxurie to defenſiue armes; and therein hauing bin vnfortunate, at length betakes her ſelfe againe to the Croſier ſtaffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occaſion of the Storie of the times of king Ahaz, during whoſe reigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

CHAP. XXV.

Of Ezekia, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomies, Nabonaſſar, Nabopolaſſar, and Mardocempadus, with the hiſtorie of the Bible.

AS the firſt yeere of Ahaz his Reigne was confounded with the laſt of his father Iotham, ſo was the later end of his ſixteen yeares taken vp in the three firſt of Ezekias his ſon. This appeares by the Reigne of Hoſea, ouer Iſrael, which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hoſea was the firſt of Ezekia; ſo it followes, that Ezekia began to reigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeere of Hoſea, the ſame being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almoſt ſpent when Ezekia began, and so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may haue beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosea began his kingdom, when the twelfth yeare of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to dis-ioyne the first of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeare later, of which yeare, Ahaz may perhaps haue liued not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be remoued out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

2 Kin. 19. 35. In the fourteenth yeere of Ezekia, Senacherib, inuading Iuda and the Countries adioyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroake from Heauen, fled home, and was slaine. The yeare following it was that God added fifteene yeares to the life of Ezekia, when he had already reigned foureteen of his nine and twenty: and the same yeere was that miracle seene of the Sunnes going backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twenty fift of April, in the Iulian yeare, being then Thursday. I haue not seene any workes of Scultet; but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of obseruation made at such a time. Howsoeuer it be, the fifteenth yeare of Ezekia agreed vpon; and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is vsuall in like cases,

2 Chron. 28. 27. that Ahaz sleept with his Fathers, and Ezekia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehosaphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reigne whilest his Father liued, wee haue already said enough.

Of this godly king Ezekias, we find, that his very beginning testified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sons proceedings, which perpaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeare and first moneth of

2 Chro. 29. v. 3. his reigne, wherein Ezekias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be vnderstood as the beginning of his sole gouernment; we plainly find it to haue beene his first worke,

2 Chron. 30. that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had shut vp, cleansed the Citie and kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bin for many yeares neglected, & brake down the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, & he called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lumpe of brasse. He did also celebrate the Passe-ouer

2 King 18. with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were, euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierusalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian seruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they neuer were deliuered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his reigne, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with Soe King of Egypt, against him, inuaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolitrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias, & his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineue; in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I haue formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom we find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to ioyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets haue written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors haue recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diuersity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures do speake of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezekia, kings of Iuda, and of Hosea king of Israel, whom he carried into captiuitie: and whereas Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherin he liued; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnezzar, that he was the same, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholcerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betweene Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seuen hundred forty and sixe yeares: at which distance of time the reigne of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bucholcerus alleadgeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadours to Hezekia King of Iuda. So that if we reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanassar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Funclius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three yeares: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, betweene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomy seemes to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty yeares, than the destruction of Ierusalem, we are to vnderstand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeare of his reigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seuen yeares. Now if we adde to these one hundred twenty seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars yeare, before the City and Temple were destroyed, we haue the summe of one hundred and forty yeares. In so plaine a case no more proofes are needelesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two yeares, after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians: which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History, and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall obseruations doe so throughly concurre.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to haue beene this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giuing the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next obseruations of the heauenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeare of whose reigne, is according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seuen yeares, seuenteene dayes, and eleauen houres: the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty sixt of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian yeares. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleeue Mardocempadus to haue beene rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrie-man Lidyat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calusius, who hath drawne into forme of Cronology, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold vp the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I haue taken the paines to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or Succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either ſilent in this point, or aduerſe to Scaliger; and other good authority, I know none, in this buſineſſe) any ſentence more neerely prouing the ſucceſſion of Merodach to Nabonaſſar, than the place now laſt rehearſed: which makes no more, to ſhew that the one of theſe was father to the other, than (that I may vſe a like example) the as neere ſucceſſion of William the Conqueror, declares him, to haue been Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confeſſor. This conſidered, we may ſafely goe on with our accompt from Nabonaſſar, taking him for Salmanaſſar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driuen from our Booke, when they find ſomething in it, agreeing with Annius, foraſmuch as theſe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemie are aſſigned to Beloſus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good Hiſtorie naming any others, that reigned there in thoſe ages; and all Aſtronomicall obſeruations, fitly concurring with the yeares that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliuerance of Iudea from Sennacherib.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Sennacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire in the fourteenth yeare of Ezekias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſer, inuited by Ahaz, inuaded Rezin King of Damaſcus, and deliuered him from the dangerous Warre which Iſrael had vndertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezekias denied, Sennacherib, hauing (as it ſeemes) a purpoſe to inuade Egypt, ſent one part of his Army to lye before Ieruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſiluer, and thirty talents of gold: wherwith he preſented Sennacherib, now ſet down before Lachis in Iudæa; yet vnder the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the King of Iudæa to deliuer hoſtages, the Aſſyrian enuironed Ieruſalem with a groſſe Army, and hauing his ſword in his hand thought it the fitteſt time to write his owne conditions.

2 King. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three great Counſellers, to parly with Rabſaces, ouer the Wall; and to receiue his demands: who vſed three principall arguments to perſwade the people to yeelde themſelues to his Maſter Sennacherib. For though the Chancellor, Steward, and Secretary, ſent by Ezekias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, & not in the Iewiſh, yet he with a louder voyce directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their own language. And for the firſt, hee made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a ſhort time, be inforced to eate their own dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether diſabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Iudæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken ſtaffe, on which whoſoeuer leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould helpe them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefely (as it is thought by ſome) the braſen Serpent, which had beene preſerued euer ſince Moſes time; and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his Maſter had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himſelfe, in whom they truſted, hee perſwaded them by no meanes to relye on him, for hee would deceiue them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vnderſtood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Army, hee himſelfe left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Sennacherib, at Libna in Iudæa, either to informe him of their reſolution in Ieruſalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Army of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezekias, whom hee partly aduiſed, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelfe: vſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezekias ſending thoſe Counſellers to the Prophet Eſay, which had lately been ſent to Rabſaces, receiued from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this heathen Idolater ſhould not preuaile; againſt whom the King alſo beſought aide from Almighty God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true. That the King of Assur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had cast fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the worke of mans hands, euen wood and stone, &c. 2. King. 19.

The reason that moued Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retraited his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for feare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Parilipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the Iewes in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hierome, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia & Assyria: which he might iustly doe, because Tiglath his grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Iordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adioyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to bee Vulcans Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs return from Pelusium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembred by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more vrgent. Saint Hierome vpon the seauen and thirty of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports Senacheribs retrait in these words. Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obsedisse Pelusium, iamque cunctis aggeribus vrbi capiendæ, venisse Taracham Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & euenisse iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrij pestilentia corruisse, narrat Herodotus: & pleniſsimè Berosus Chaldaicæ scriptor Historiæ, quorum fides de propijs libris petenda est; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Ægyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhacas King of the Ethiopians came to helpe them, and that in one night, neere Ierusalem, one hundred eightie fiue thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldean Storie, whose credit is to be taken from their owne Bookes. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Army vvas in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlewinde and a tempest, and a flame of deuouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authority (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted; Sennacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello reuertens, ostendit ibi exercitum, quem sub Rabsacis imperio reliquerat peste diuinitus immissâ deletum, primâ nocte posteaquam Vrbem oppugnare cœperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copijs sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quæ Ninus dicitur. Vbi paulo post per insidias Seniorum è filijs suis, Adramelechi, & Selennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasci; quem præcipuo cultu dignabatur, quibus ob patricidium à populoribus pulsis & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldas minor filius in Regnum successit; Sennacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Egyptian warre, found there his Armie, which hee had left vnder the command of Rabsaces, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that hee had begunne to assault the Towne: one hundred fourescore and fiue thousand of the Souldiers beeing consumed with their Chieftaines and Coronels. with which destruction beeing terrified, and withall affraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, hee made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adramelech and Selennar or Sharezer, hee lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroth: *whom hee especially worshipped. It is certaine, that Venus Vrania vvas worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Iupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonnes had to murther him; but the most likely it is, that hee had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tels vs, that it was fifty fiue dayes after Sennacheribs return, ere hee was murthered by his sonnes; during which time hee slew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineue, till the most iust God turned the sword against his owne breast.

AFter this maruellous deliuery, Ezekias sickned, and was told by Isaiah, that hee must dye: but after hee had besought God with teares for his deliuery, Isaiah, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recouery after three dayes, and a prolongation of life for fifteene yeares. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a 4 King. 20. signe to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrary way, and went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Messias should come out of the house of Dauid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine giuen him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges, layed to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wise-men of Chaldæa had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house; he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, vvho told him; The daies
Isay 39. are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoeuer thy Fathers haue layed vp in store to this day, shall bee carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezekia should haue got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with aduantage, and made Ezekia richer vpon the suddaine than euer he had been: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezekia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life; he dyed hauing reigned nine and twenty years. One onely offensiue Warre hee made, vvhich was against the Philistims with good successe. A-Eccles. 48. mong his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he deuised to bring water to Ierusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he reioyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recouery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakned the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant vnder Senacherib in Babylon, vsurped that State himselfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This aduantage Merodach espied, and remembring, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunity which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make vse of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himselfe beloued of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazzard, and preuailed. The assertion of this history is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut a-sunder the Line of Ninus, there were only fiue Kings.

But forasmuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherin the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to haue bin an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last fiue and twenty were spent with Ezechia, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reigne of Ezechia: Of the difference found between sundry Authors, in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezechia: of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezechia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that variety of names, by which these Kings were called in seuerall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sons reigning with the fathers, haue caused not only the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselues, of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, haue been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is ouer-highly commended of trustinesse: so it is, that the names, number, and length of reigne, are all very diuersly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those Writers that vary from Eusebius, is more than I dare vndertake. I will only here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors haue deliuered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reignes thus:

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some little variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seemes to me an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by coniectures founded vpon

Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burden vpon Euſebius, who liued in an age better furniſhed than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two Kings (whom I haue reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

Theſe names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retaine; but adde vnto theſe, Cyaxares the ſon of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting down the length of a Kings reigne, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variations, I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure firſt that were choſen Gouernors of Athens for ten yeers, that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I heare nothing, ſaue that Rome was built in his firſt yeere; of which perhaps himſelf did not heare. Of the ſecond and third I find only the names. The fourth made himſelf known by a ſtrange example of iuſtice, or rather of crueltie, that he ſhewed vpon his own Daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in vnchaſtity, cauſed her to be lockt vp with an Horſe, giuing to neither of them any foode: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappy Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and founder of that Citie Romulus, did reigne both before, and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King, ruled in the ſame age.

This Region was firſt called Mæonia. Lydus the ſon of Atys reigning in it, gaue the name of Lydia, if we beleeue ſuch authority as we find. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alceus the ſon of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of theſe Heraclidæ continued reigning fifty fiue yeeres (in which two and twenty Generations paſſed) the ſon continually ſucceeding the father. Candaules the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much vpon the beauty of his owne wife, that he could not be content to enioy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the ſon of Daſcylus, to behold her naked body; & placed the vnwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the Queen perceiued Gyges at his going forth, and vnderſtanding the matter, took it in ſuch high diſdain, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treaſon. So Gyges being brought againe into the ſame chamber by the Queen, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight yeeres, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys reigned nine & forty years; then Sadyattes, twelue; Haliattes, fifty ſeuen; and finally Cræſus, the ſon of Halyattes, fourteen years: who loſt the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Cræſus his Progenitor diſpoſſeſt, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there ſprang many other Kings, which gouerned ſeuerall Countries very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Meſſenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, & Argiues; and from the Argiues, the Macedonians; as likewiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſanes: beſides many great and famous, though priuate, Families.

But of the Heraclidæ that reigned in Lydia, I haue not troubled my ſelf to take notice in the time of their ſeuerall reignes: for little is found of them, beſide the bare names, & the folly of this laſt king Candaules.

Chap. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, betweene the deliuerance of Israel from thence, and the reigne of Ezekiah in Iuda, when Egypt and Iuda made a league against the Assyrians.

§. I.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to haue belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proouing this out of William of Tyre his History of the holy warre.

THe emulation & quarrels arising in these times, betweene the mighty Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, do require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting downe briefly the state of that Country, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the Mastrie. Of Cham the son of Noah, vvho first planted that Country, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that reigned there, vntill the Israelites were thence deliuered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here againe helpe me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was; and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therfore I will not only forbeare to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus haue reckoned vp, from the mouthes of Egyptian Priests, deliuering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their reignes, and other circumstances prouing them to haue been Kings in deed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginary ground, wherupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to giue vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparant reason, and truth of History doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests haue reckoned vp, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham, our Sauiour Christ was remoued onely forty two descents; which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time namely before the Persian Empire, there could not haue passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, hauing reigned longer than forty years. It followes that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries. As for the rest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to finde names enow, of such as might be thought to haue reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselues with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick king of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalrick made vpon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his party good against him, if he could get any forces wherwith to enter Egypt.

Briefly,

Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but hee enioyed it not: for in few daies after, he was slaine by treason, whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great City of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whileſt he might haue the profit of it, and enioy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) do neerly touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leaue him, and quietly go their way home. They seize vpon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arriuall of more company from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceiues their intent, and findes himselfe not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Army, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messengers to King Almaricke of Ierusalem, whom with large promises, he gets to bring him aide, and so driues out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (vvho was oppoſite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet that false Prophet, the Soueraignty ouer all that vvere of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weakenesse of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing seruice in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, vvith the Western parts, vnder the subiection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and ioyfully entertained; all the Eastern Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that vvith all his forces he hasteth into Egypt: vvell knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keepe the Saracens from ioyning all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giuing them all manner of content, as it behooued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victory was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to haue been King in title only, who medled so little in the Gouernment? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre cals it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Ierusalem should receiue out of Egypt, for this behouefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much soeuer he tooke vpon him) was subiect to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himselfe. Hereupon Hugh Eare of Cæsarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are sent vnto Elhadech to ratifie the couenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadors were conueighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriuing at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, vvhich with all diligence, did reuerence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beauty and riches, that they could not retaine the grauity of Embassadours, but were inforced to admire the things vvhich detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all vvrought ouer with embossed vvorkes, curious pauements, fish-ponds of marble vvith clear vvaters, and many sorts of strange birds, vnknown in those parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was vndiscouered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conueyed them into other Courts within these; as far excelling the former, as the former did surpasse ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brough into the Caliphs own lodgings, which were yet more stately, and better guarded; where entring the Presence, the Soldan hauing twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he wore about his necke, and throw himself on the ground, before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph sate. Presently the trauerse, wrought with Gold and Pearles was opened, and the Caliph himself discouered, sitting vvith great maiestie on a throne of gold, hauing few of his most inward seruants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almerick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he vvould throughly perform all which vvas promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would haue him to giue his hand vpon the bargaine; vvhich the Egyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent requeſt. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Eale of Cæsarea saw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither vvillingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seekes no holes to hide it selfe; Princes, that vvill hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly & sincerely; Giue vs therfore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we vvill make no bargaine vvith your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But, when it vvould none otherwise be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) he vouchsafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so reheasing the couenants vvord by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, vve may discerne the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself vvith the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royall power; making war and peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forrain Prince. What greater authority vvas giuen to Ioseph, vvhen Pharaoh said vnto him, Thou shalt be ouer mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, onely in the Kings throne will I be aboue thee, Behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt.

I do not commend this forme of Gouernment; neither can I approue the coniecture of mine Author, where he thinkes, that the Egyptians, euer since Iosephs time, haue felt the burden of that seruitude which hee brought vpon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his iudgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Egyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that euen the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were giuen, all of them, wholly to please their own appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherin the Egyptians held their Princes, gaue them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers, with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to haue shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a liuely example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who liued in the same age; was, in few yeares after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Cæsarea, touching all these matters. Wherfore it remaines, that we be not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians haue honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to haue reigned in that Country; after whom it followes that we should make enquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres, whether he were Vchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vaine to bee too curious. For who can hope to attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good seruice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to bee beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may iustly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities remoued so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius, haue not beene silent, and that Reinecc ius hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the reigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greekes call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and giue to euery one the same length of reigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chencres, that perished in the Red Sea. This king seemes to Reinecc ius to be the same whom Diodorus cals Vchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great king, named Osymandyas, from whom Vchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reinecc ius coniectures) was the great Osymandyas; or else that this Atherres was Vchoreus: for the distance betweene them was more than eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Osymandyas to haue bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wiues, into the Catologue of Kings, because he was King in his wiues right. As for Vchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdous, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Vchoreus, who might haue had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandias, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Army with the siege of a Town, the captiuitie of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others iudge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to haue beene erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as euery one to haue his owne particular monument, striuing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statuaes, therein placed, by the Wars, the iudgement seate, the receiuing of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Reuennues, and plenty of all Cattell and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the seuerall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceed some of my workes. Let them that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lye, it should seeme that hee lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Ioseph, whose body was preserued among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, & this empty Monument might king Orus, who out-liued him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royal sepulchres. To which purpose, the plenty of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name giuen to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his increase of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkish Bassaes are called, that is, Great aboue the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning fals out right, betwixt the times of Ioseph & Acherres (for Acherres was the eight in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniecture, as touching Ioseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Geboar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Elcain; who hauing to his Masters vse conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great City of Cairo (corruptely so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himselfe were a Dalmatian slaue. Iohn Leo. Hist. Afric. l. 1. & 4.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameſſes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that beares his name.

WHen Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded & held the kingdome fifteene years: then reigned Armeus fiue years, & after him Rameſſes, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameſſes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greekes, vnder the names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the kingdome of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom vpon seeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his brothers fifty sons, but commanded euery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did saue her husband Lynceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudy sisters, when they died, were enioyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessell with water.

The reigne of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; & Rameſſes, Ægyptus; is more than Reineccius beleeues: he rather takes Armeus to haue bin Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to bee made which beares his name. For my own part, as I can easily beleeue, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so do I not find how in so short a reigne, as fiue years, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therin; wherof his own Sepulchre and his wiues being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose reignes we haue no assurance, I may truly say, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Ioseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bond-men, and all their land for bread; of Geboar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Country Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reignes, whom wee finde to haue followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand fixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fifty fadomes deepe. It serued to receiue the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Countrie: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fifty talents; but the Lake it self defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was euery day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet oyntments, and other ornaments for her body. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; hauing on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon diuided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should haue reigned one yeare and odde moneths of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Ramesses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdome forty years. Some giue him only nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinkes him to haue been the king that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I haue already spoken in the first Booke.

§. IIII.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

Sethosis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifty fiue yeares. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesostris. But the state of the world vvas not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesostris made, could haue been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceiue, if he looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who liued with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynasty of the Larthes, which Reinecsius coniectures to haue had the same signification, wherin the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Larthes, (the Hetrurians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to haue signified as much as Imperator, or Generall. The Wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to haue been against the Æthiopians: for sure I am, that they troubled not the Country of Palæstina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand, nor is it likely that they trauelled ouer the desart sands on the other hand; to seek matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Affrica. But these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Fiue only had that title; and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first; in such sort as the Romane Emperours were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vnsufferable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbeare the name.

Here it may be obiected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings also did administer the gouernment themselues, & that therefore I am deceiued in ascribing so much vnto the Viceroyes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only vpon coniecture, and that the authory of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we finde in Iohn Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldane Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignty to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, stiled Eddaguadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Family was almost as great, as the Soldans own. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, spend of the Soldans Treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselues, taking the charge, or title of Generals vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnes of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Country, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seuenteenth Dynasty was called of the Sheepheards, because Ioseph gouerned in part therof; or from the Kings themselues that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres and Sesac, reigned therin, if many others did not. But let vs now return to the businesse which we left.

Ramesses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and sixe yeares. He is mistaken for that second Sesostris, of whom I haue spoken in the first books. I find nothing worth rehearsall of this Ramesses, or of Ammenophis and Aunemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the later sixe and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seuen years; yet is he thought to haue bin that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the sacke of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his reigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by ſome) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greeke Writers in this buſineſſe, or in other ſuch matters, may ſeeme to be vnder-Officers: for ſuch only are like to haue had their reſidencie about Pharos, and the Sea-coaſt, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is ſaid, That he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himſelfe into all ſhapes: whereby is ſignified his craftie head, for which he is grown into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seale-fiſhes, for belike he was ſome vnder-Officer to the Admirall, hauing charge of the Fiſhing about the Iſle of Pharos, as was ſaid before.

Remphes, the Son of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as alſo by Herodotus, who calls him Ramſinitus, & tells a long tale, fit to pleaſe children, of his couetouſneſſe, and how his treaſure-houſe was robbed by a cunning Theefe, that at laſt married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what he liſt. How long this king reigned I know not, nor thinke that either he, or his Father, did reigne at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings whoſe names are found ſcattering in ſundrie Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres and Seſac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings, are found ſcattered heere and there; as Tenephersobii, of vvhom Suidas deliuers onely the bare name and title; Sememares, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, vvho perhaps was the ſame that by Suidas is called Semyes, or Eueues, noted by occaſion of a great Phyſician that liued vnder him; Xanthippe, recorded by the ſame Suidas, for his great iuſtice; and Thulis, of vvhom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Iſle of Thule, which ſome take to be Iſeland; and that he conſulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, deſiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him ſhould be ſo mighty as himſelfe. The anſwer or confeſſion of the Deuill was remarkeable; which I find Engliſhed in the tranſlation of Pleſsis his worke, Of the trueneſſe of Chriſtian religion. The Greeke Verſes are ſomewhat otherwiſe, & much more imperfect in thoſe Copies that I haue of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the ſenſe is all one, which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit,
Which three be One, and ioyne in One all three:
Whoſe force is endleſſe. Get thee hence fraile vvight,
The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I ſhould haue thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found ſomewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vſed, & that clauſe of his giuing name to the Iland: though in this laſt point I hold Suidas to be deceiued; as alſo Cedrenus is, or (at leaſt) ſeems to me, in giuing to this King ſuch profound antiquitie of reigne. Indeed the very name of that booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Geneſis, is alone enough to breed ſuſpition of ſome impoſture: but the Frierly ſtuffe that he alledgeth out of it, is ſuch as vvould ſerue to diſcredit himſelfe, were it not otherwiſe apparant, that he vvas a man both deuout, & of good iudgement, in matters that fell vvithin his compaſſe. I will here ſet down the Liſt of old Egyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leaue the cenſure to others.

The firſt king of Egypt that he ſets downe, is Mizraim, the ſonne of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriuing their pedegree thus: Nimrod, the ſon of Chus, was alſo called Orion, & further tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, & by her three ſonnes; Picus, ſurnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chaſing his father out of Aſſyria into Italie, reigned in his ſtead thirtie yeares, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his ſiſter and wife, and to Belus his ſon: after which Belus, who reigned onely two yeares, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to viſit his olde father Saturne; Saturne forth-with reſigned the Kingdome vnto him. Picus Iupiter reigned in Italie threeſcore and two yeares, had threeſcore and ten Wiues or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Iſle of Crete.

The Principall of Iupiters sons were Faunus, Pasiphae, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: he reigned in Italie, after his father; fiue and thirtie yeares: and then finding that all his brethren conspired against him, he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Misraim, he got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirty yeares. After Mercurius, Kailas reigned in Egypt, foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the sonne of Vulcan, reigned twenty yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Osis, Osiris, Orus, and Thules; of whom we spake before: the length of their seuerall reignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesostris king twenty yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Nencheres, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I find them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to haue reigned in Egypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might haue beene added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Roboboam, lead vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius, for it. Those giue vs not the length of his reigne, but we know, that he liued in the times of Dauid and Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Cananites, & gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wiues and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princesse. In the life of Roboam all hath bin written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reigne, which must haue bin fiue and twenty yeares, if he were that Suendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serue to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, vpon which the rest haue dependance, this course I take. From the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, king of Iuda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon vpwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesac: by which accompt, the first yeare of Sesac is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reigne, and the twenty fixe of Sesac with the fifth of Roboboam: wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and died, enioying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, than Ioas the Israelite, & Crassus the Romane did; who after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To fill vp the time between Sesac and Neco, I haue rather taken those kings that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of these that are deliuered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, saue only of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to haue bin a king. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Æthiopians, which got the kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long & flourishing continuance of that house, insomuch, that they said of Pharaoh, I am the Sonne of the wise, I am the Sonne of the ancient King. But that which ouerthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the reignes of Iosias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed marres all, the reigne of Iosias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting to compare the reignes of the kings of Iuda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion, Ioram, king of Israel, is made to reigne three yeares after Ahazia of Iuda; Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Hezekia was king: and in a word, all, or most of the kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere, of their collaterals, than the Scriptures haue determined.

§. VI. Of

§. VI.

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned betweene the times of Reheboam and Ezekia.

FOllowing therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome vpwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seuen akers euerie way, and vvas aboue sixe akers high. It vvas of a very hard & dureable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, vvithout complaining of any iniurie that it had suffered by vveather in so long space. From the reigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Cæsar, vvherein Diodore liued, are indeede a thousand yeares; vvhich doth giue the better likelihood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they haue seene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabrens succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabrens) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to haue beene brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the later to haue beene son to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeares; Cephrenes fiftie sixe. These vvere, as Chemmis had beene builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had ouer-laboured themselues in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; & to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honor, & entituling a poore fellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies: otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might be, that they, who had not power to auoid the like slauerie, laid vpon them by the younger brother or son, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting money did prostitute her, & that she, getting of euery man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the middest of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery, for her sake, longer a while than they thought to haue done, in raising a Monument, vvith the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions. Diodor. l. 1. Herod. l. 2.

Mycerinus, the son of Cephrenes, reigned after his Father sixe yeares. He vvould haue built as his fore-goers did, but preuented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of sixe yeers only, because of this his deuotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should haue beene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou liue but sixe yeeres. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended vvith a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, vvhen the people were desirous to serue them; or that they hauing so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was, doubtlesse, more offended with the institution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, vvhether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeare of his Father Sesac, that made him perceiue, and deliuer to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is that his reigne, and the reignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, vvere more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, vvho, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a seruice more pleasing to the Deuil, than the restitution of Idolatrie durst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I find in Reineccius fiftie yeares assigned to this King; which I verily beleeue to haue bin some error of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such ouersights: for I know no Aut hor that giues him so many yeares, and Reineccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diuers Authors, as one that loued iustice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. yeeres of his reigne.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Æthiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paied. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne iudgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blinde man, before the Æthiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted betweene Bocchorus, and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeeres; and so long doth Funclius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two kings, between them both did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable that the reignes of two kings should haue bin so soone spent; hee may doe it by taking some yeares from Sethon or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconuenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reigne, must haue beene in the fifth of Reboboam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Iehoiakim, and the first of Nabuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow sixe yeares onely to these two kings, than to lose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacheribs warre: at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde yeares vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Egyptian kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leaue both Asychis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, & extending his life yet sixe yeares further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reigne) into the yeares of Reboboam.

1. King. 14. 25. 2. Chron. 12. v. 2

Of Sabacus the Æthiopian, who tooke the kingdome from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out their seruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vse than pompe, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonoras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserue the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroching power of the Assyrian, grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, hauing eaten so farre into Syria, in the reigne of this one king So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his dayes (for his reigne began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Sennacheribs Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezekia might haue found it, had he not beene supported by the strong staffe of him, that ruleth all Nations with a rodde of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Egyptian forces, for Charrets and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe which So left vnto Sethon his successor, hauing now fulfilled the fiftie yeares of his reigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this king; saying, that he left the Country, & willingly retired into Æthiopia, because becauſe it was often ſignified vnto him in his dreames, by the god which was worſhipped at Thebes, that his reigne ſhould be neither long nor proſperous, vnleſſe he ſlew all the Prieſts in Egypt; which rather than to do, he reſigned his kingdome. Surely, theſe Egyptian gods were of a ſtrange qualitie, that ſo ill rewarded their ſeruants, and inuited kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewiſe did) worſhip Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which loue their Maſters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Prieſts ſhould haue feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be ſome deuice of the fearefull old man, who ſeeing his Realme in danger of an inuaſion, ſought an honeſt excuſe for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himſelfe into Æthiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one ſhould ſay, that the Æthiopia, into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the king (perhaps at the inſtigation of this man) raiſed an Armie againſt Sennacherib, when he meant to inuade Egypt, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my ſelf with ſuch enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sebacus, was not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time liued the Prophet Eſay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs houſe) but onely ſo ſurnamed for his education, and becauſe iſſuing from thence, he got the kingdom from Anyſis, who was his oppoſite. The quiet and milde forme of his gouernment; his holding the kingdome ſo long without an Armie; and many other circumſtances argue no leſſe. But whether finally hee betooke a priuate life, or whether he fore-went his life and kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leaue him, and ſpeake of Sethon his next Succeſſor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a ſure token of his hauing beene king.

§. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezekia, and ſided with him againſt Sennacherib.

THe firſt yeare of Sethons reigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, vvhich was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troubleſome age, and full of danger; the two great kingdomes of Aſſyria and Egypt, beeing then ingaged in a Warre, the iſſue whereof was to determine, whether of them ſhould rule or ſerue. The Aſſyrian had the better men of Warre; the Egyptian better proniſion of neceſſaries: the Aſſyrian, more Subiects; the Egyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subiects of Aſſur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Aſſyrian in outward ſhew.

Of this laſt ſort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them againſt his owne great Enemy, preferred the friendſhip of ſo neare and mighty a Neighbour, before the ſeruice of a terrible, yet farre remoued King. But herein was great difference, between Ezekia and his Subiects: For the good King, fixing his eſpeciall confidence in God, held that courſe of policy, which he thought moſt likely to turne to the benefit of his Country: the multitude of Iudea, looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promiſed, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was ſafe, and that now they ſhould not need to feare any more of thoſe iniuries, which they had ſuffered by the Aſſyrians, and ſo became forgetfull of God, taking counſaile but not of him. The Prophet Eſay complained much of this preſumption; giuing the people of Iuda to vnderſtand; That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horſes fleſh, and not ſpirit; that God himſelfe ſhould defend Iſrael vpon repentance, and that Aſſur ſhould fall by the ſword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (ſaid the Prophet) they are vanity, and they ſhall helpe in vaine, their ſtrength is to ſit ſtill.

Eſay.31.v.3. & 8.
Eſay.30.7.
Eſay 3.4.

According to the Prophets words it came to paſſe. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zoan, all maner of contentment and aſſurance was giuen to the Iewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with ſuch reports, of Horſes and Charrets, that they did not looke (as Eſay ſaith) vnto the holy one of Iſrael, nor ſeeke vnto the Lord. But he yet is wiſeſt.

Eſay 31.1.2.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, & wakened them out of theſe dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did ſeem farre off, being vnready, when his helpe was moſt needfull. It may ſeem that he purpoſed, rather to make Paleſtina than Egypt the ſtage, whereon this great Warre ſhould be acted, and was not without hope, that the Aſſyrians and Iewes, weakening one another, ſhould yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden vvith treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit.

Esay 30.6. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaca,) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selfe, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God, Esay 31.9. and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did goe, for feare, to his Tower, that is, hee fled to Nineue, where he was slaine.

Conterning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in defence of him & their Country; that Sethon being Vulcans Priest, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, & the like) marched towards Pelasium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the bowes, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they vvere faine the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselues disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set vp in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that holds me serue God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their own King, it may easily be perceiued. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did forbeare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Iewes vvas then well knowne to the vvorld, whereof euery childe could haue told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We find this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib king of the Assyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peraduenture some borderers vpon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Egypt, and was miraculously driuen home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; happy it vvas (if Sethon vvere a Priest) that he tooke his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeares before this, all the Priests in Egypt should haue bin slaine, if a mercifull king had not spared their liues, as it vvere halfe against the gods will. Therfore this last good turne vvas not enough to serue as an exmple, that might stir vp the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their deuotion, vvhich had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hierogly phically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes vvhich came, no man knew from vvhence. For the vengeance of God, shewed vpon this vngodly king, was indeed a very good motiue to pietie. But the Embleme, together vvith the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne vvhere this Image was erected) might giue occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be roobed of his honour. Yet that vve may not bellie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Iewes (euen such of them as most were giuen to Idolatrie) would haue bin ashamed of Esay 31.1. the confidence which they reposed in the Charets of Egypt, because they were many, and in the Horsemen, because they were very strong; had it bin told them, that Sehon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good lucke; or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoeuer it was, doubtlesse the prophecie of Esay tooke effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor do them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisedome, when resting secure vpon profession that it selfe hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to haue bin set downe by Eusebius, vnder the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therfore the twenty yeares which are giuen to Tarachus, they allow to the reigne of Sethon. Theſe haue well obſerued, that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a king of Egypt, but as a friend to that Countrie, or at leaſt an enemy to Sennacherib, in the war laſt ſpoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are engliſhed) ouer which he reigned, being indeede Chuſites or Arabians. Hereupon they ſuppoſe aright, that Euſebius hath miſtaken one King for another. But whereas they think, that this Tarachus or Tirhaka, is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore giue to Sethon the twentie yeares of Tarachus, I hold them to haue erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his Reigne ouer Egypt, by Euſebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezekia, in the firſt yeere of Manaſſes King of Iuda. Therefore he, or his yeeres, haue no reference to Sethon.

Tarachus

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Funcius peremptorily, citing no author, nor alleadging reaſon for it, ſets him down thirty three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this caſe, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my ſelf at the firſt, for meaſuring the reigns of theſe Egyptian Kings. The yeares which paſſed from the firſt of Rehoboam, vnto the fourth of Iehoiakim, I ſo diuide among the Egyptians, that giuing to euery one the proportion allowed vnto him by the Author in whom he is found, the reſt is to be conferred vpon him whoſe length of reigne is vncertanie; that is, vpon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirty three yeares, that are ſet downe by Funcius, to agree very neerely, if not preciſely, with the time of Sethons reigne; therefore I conforme my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to haue it one yeare leſſe. The reaſon of this computation I ſhall render more at large, when I arriue at the time of Pſammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the courſe of this Hiſtory will ſhortly bring me, the Egyptian affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which it is meete that I returne.

Chap. XXVII.

Of Manaſſes and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

The wickednesse of Manaſſes. His impriſonment, Repentance, and Death

Manaſſe, the Son of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father and the proſperitie which followed him, ſet vp, repaired, adorned and furniſhed, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Diuell was by the Heathen vvorſhipped. Beſides, he himſelfe eſteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the Hoſte of Heauen, as gods, and worſhipped them: and of all his acts the moſt abominable vvas, that he burnt his Sons for a Sacrifice to the Diuell Moloch, or Adelchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Diuels.

He alſo gaue himſelfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied & maintained thoſe that had familiar Spirits, and all ſorts of Enchanters: beſides, he ſhed ſo much innocent bloud, as Ieruſalem was repleniſhed therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, vvhen he was reprehended by that aged & reuerent Prophet Eſay (who was alſo of the kings race, & as the Iewes affirme, the Father-in-law of the King) he cauſed the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Siloe to be ſawne in ſunder, with a woodden ſaw, in the eightieth yeere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous & monſtrous than hath beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are ſilent hereof, yet the ſame is confirmed by Epiphanius, Iſidore, Euſebius, and others, too many to rehearſe, and too good to be ſuſpected. Therefore the Lord brought vpon them the Captaines of the Hoſt of the Kings of Aſſur, which tooke Manaſſe, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel. Where after he had lien twenty yeeres as a captiue, and diſpoyled of all honour and hope; yet to his hearty repentance and continuall tinuall prayer, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliuer him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie and estate. After which, and when he was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, & Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detested his former fooliſh and deuillish Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erecting, prepared the Altar of God, & sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Ierusalem: and dyed after the long reigne of fiftie fiue yeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleeue as it shall please their fancies,

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reigne of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would haue inuited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous to enlarge his Empire, to make attempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Egypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Iuda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with ciuill dissention, & after two yeeres, ill amended by a diuision of the gouernment betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these, eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Egypt, with the diuision of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raigne of Sabacus, and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelue Gouernors, immediatly before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissension seemes to haue bin the vncertainty of title to that Kingdome (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of bloud, I haue often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelue, though things were not setled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraigntie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preserue, they made strait couenant & alliances one with another, being iealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnitie lasted, they ioyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neere vnto the Lake of Meris, a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirmes) no words could giue it commendation answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it self. I will not here set downe that vnperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the faireſt workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue bin the worke of Marus, or Menides, a king which liued fiue generations before Proteus, that is, before the Warre of Troy; and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dedalus took the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue bin Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dedalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Iosephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of Amasis, and Actisanes the Æthiopian, mentioned by Diodore, held it consequent, after he had coniectured Manethons Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actisanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a coniecture; the times which we now handle are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amysis, Actisanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus giues the the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the Æthiopian deposed Anysis; Actisanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing offenders; so likewise vvas Sabacus; Marus the next king after Actisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (sauing Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as hauing not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as liuing neerer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleeued the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Hals, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelue Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cuppes. Hereupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being iealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeue to haue bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hyred Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquisht his Companions, and made himselfe sole King.

The yeeres of his reigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeares to his single reigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for he cannot in reason be supposed to haue beene then a young fellow) into the number of the twelue Gouernors, must be thought to haue liued vnto extreame age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore & nine yeares. I therfore yeeld rather to Eusebius, but will not aduenture to cut fiue years from the Aristocratie: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelue but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed and was ten yeares companion in that gouernment.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeers of the Egyptians, as we find them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill vp the time, between the fift of Rehoboam, & the fourth of Iehoiakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from Sethons reigne, that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; becanse Funcius may haue followed better authority than I know, or than himselfe alleadgeth, in giuing to Sethon a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last yeere of one reigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronologicall tables, reigned precisely so many yeeres as are prescribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplyed the defect of anothers. Wherfore I confound the last yeare of those fifteene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, & make himselfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt, vvho entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gaue large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsooke their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wiues, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought vp in such sort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Becos, Becos, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, serued greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his workes, may find enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks vsed none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch, and giuen by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble, and talke, one knew what.

But I will not insist vpon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palastina, about which he spent nine and twenty yeers. Neuer haue we heard (saith Herodotus) that any Citie endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had beene won by Tartan, a Captaine of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieued, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might haue to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner.

WEre it certainely knowne, in what yeere of his reigne Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained libertie; I thinke we should finde these Egyptian troubles to haue beene no small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that euen they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the ciuill vvarres in Egypt that followed vpon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelue peeces; or the vvarre betweene Psammiticus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria; and the siege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make sure vvorke vvith the King of Iuda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he vvas taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, vvinne his Countrey, but onely vvaste it. So that the Iewes, hauing learned vvit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, vvere like to be more circumspect, in making their bargaine vpon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little kingdome of Iuda could afford) had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, vvhereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement, vvhen by quitting his present aduantage ouer the Iewes, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manasses his reigne, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are silent, & Iosephus giues no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions, the one of Bellarmine, vvho thinkes that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeare of his reigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, vvho affirmes, that it vvas in his twentie seuenth yeare; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, vvho saith, that he vvas fortie yeares an Idolater, and lined fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these coniectures is vpheld by Torniellus, vvho reiects the second, as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alledged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where neede requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to haue vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before before he gaue his iudgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manasses, is said by Iosephus, to haue followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses growne old in his sinnes, it is like that hee should haue continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeares old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimhi) vntill he was fifteene yeares from death. Touching the second; howsoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two & fiftie yeares, shall be punished with finall impenitency. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to haue taken vp no great part of his life; the story of him being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sinne that he sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the kings of Iuda? 2 Kings 21.17. The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearsing the calamities with vvhich that Nation was punished in the time of Iehoiakim, the great Grand-childe of this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this vpon Iuda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sinnes of Manasses, according to all that he did, and for the innocent bloud that he shed (for he filled Ierusalem with innocent bloud) therfore the Lord would not pardon it. 2 King. 24.3.4. Who so considers vvell these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteen yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seuen yeare old, he repented, and becomming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of ciuill dissension in Egypt, foureteene or fifteen yeares following, vvherein that kingdome was vveakened, by partition of the Soueraignty: the vvarre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and foure and twenty yeares, of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all vvithin the time of Manasses, did leaue no one part of his reigne (after the first fifteen yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All vvhich I will adde hereto, is this; that the fifteenth of Manasses, was the last yeare of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reigne, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seuen and twentieth of Manasses, was the tenth of the twelue Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the son of of Merodach, in Babylon: but vvhich of these was the yeare of his imprisonment, or vvhether any other, I forbeare to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer-violently to mine owne computation.

This vvas the first great mastrie that the Babylonians had of the kingdome of Iuda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that he hoped to stay Sennacheribs enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of siluer, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which couered the doores, and pillars of the Temple. 2 Kings 18.

But Manasses being pressed with greater necessity, could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among vvhich it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of seruitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, whilest they vvere enemies to Babylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Iuda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Necò, in fauour of Nabulassar, which had beene against all reason reaſon and policie, if it had not bin his duty by couenant. Of this I will ſpeake more in conuenient place.

§. IV.

Of the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian Warres, which were in the reignes of Ezekia, and Manaſſes, Kings of Iuda.

NOw concerning ſuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about theſe times of Manaſſes, the moſt remarkeable were the Meſſenian Warres; which happened in this age, and being the greateſt action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Perſian Wars, deſerue not to be paſſed ouer with ſilence.

The firſt Meſſenian Warre began and ended in the dayes of Ezekia; the ſecond in the reign of Manaſſes: but to auoide the trouble of interrupting our Hiſtory, I haue thought it beſt, to rehearſe them both in this place. Other introduction is needleſſe, than to ſay, that the poſteritie of Hercules, driuing the iſſue of Pelops and the Achæans out of their ſeates, diuided their lands betweene themſelues, and erected the Kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Meſſene, & Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and ſought one anothers ruine with bloudy Wars; whereof theſe Meſſenian were the greateſt.

The pretended grounds of the Meſſenian Warre, are ſcarce worth remembrance, they vvere ſo ſleight. Ambition was the true cauſe of it: wherewith the Lacedæmonians were ſo tranſported, that any thing ſerued them as a colour to accompliſh their greedy deſires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares a Meſſenian had ſlaine many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magiſtrates of Sparta deſiring to haue him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Meſſenians on the other ſide, excuſed Polychares, for that he was grown franticke, through iniuries receiued from Euephnes a Lacedæmonian. This Euephnes had bargained to giue paſture to the Cattell of Polychares, & was therfore to receiue part of the increaſe: but not contented with the gaine appointed, he ſold the Cattaile, and ſlaues that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, ſaying, that they were ſtollen. Whileſt the lye was yet ſcarce out of his mouth, one of the ſlaues that had eſcaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confeſſed all, and promiſed large amends; which to receiue, he carried the Son of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, he villanouſly ſlew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians hauing refuſed, after long ſuite made by the wretched Father, to do him right againſt this Theefe & Murderer, ought not to picke matter of quarrel, out of thoſe things, which he did in that madneſſe, whereinto they themſelues had caſt him. So ſaid the Meſſenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromiſe, or to ſtand vnto the iudgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counſaile of Greece, or to any other faire courſe. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great deſire to occupie the faire Countrie of Meſſene, that lay cloſe by them, were not content with ſuch allegations. They thought it enough, to haue ſome ſhew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old iniuries, & ſo without ſending any defiance, ſecretly tooke an oath to hold warre with Meſſene, till they had maſtered it: which done, they ſeized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few eſcaped.

Hereupon the Meſſenians tooke Armes, and vvere met by the Enemie. A furious battaile was fought between them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victory. The Meſſenians did ſtrongly encampe themſelues; The Lacedæmonians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre began in the ſecond yeare of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the firſt of the foureteenth Olympiad, hauing laſted twenty yeares. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians waſting the inland parts of Meſſene; and the Meſſenians, the Sea-coaſt of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both ſides, were called in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argiues, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Meſſene; the Spartans had, beſides many Subiects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a ſecond, third and fourth battaile, were fought, with as great obſtinacie as the firſt; ſauing that in the fourth battaile the Lacedæmonians were enforced ced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still vncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their king, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeares were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a towne vpon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their vow, that hauing absented themselues ten yeares from Sparta, their wiues sent them word, that their City would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had been borne them in all that time: Whereupon they sent backe all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with childe, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus referres the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian Warre, when the Deuill in an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stocke of * Ægyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lyciscus; Epibolus the Priest, willing to saue her, said, she was onely a fostered childe, and not borne of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his owne Daughter: but a young Noble man, being in loue with the Maide, when otherwise he could not preuaile, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with childe: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the graue of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of preuailing against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Country, which he loued most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselues distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained in most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearely fruits of their land they were bound to send vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wiues, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of euery Spartan King; they were also sworne to liue in true subiection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territory was taken from them, which was giuen to the Asmæi, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

Diod. l.15.

* This Aegyptus was the youngest Son of Cresphon by Merope, the daughter of Cypselus King of Arcadia: of which Cresphon the chiefe Nobility of the Messenians was propagated.

This peace being made vpon so vneuen tearmes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty yeares it continued (the Messenians not finding how to helpe themselues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able young men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselues equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorned to serue such Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman, of the house of Æpytus; who perceiuing the vniforme desires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argiues & Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth yeare of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their owne, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought between them, & a doubtfull; saue that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to thinke them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would haue made him their King; but hee, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better prouided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Messenians had the Argiues, Arcadians, & Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudy fight; but Aristomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies runne for their liues. Of such importance was this victory, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethinke themselues, of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-enforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander king of Sparta, who did set vpon him in hope to haue recouered the booty.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell vpon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, king of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butchery. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principall Citie, all the townes of Messene, standing too far from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, & the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conueyed into a place of safety. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleauen yeares. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. Hee wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattell, and all prouisions, necessary for his owne people; the Slaues aand houshold stuffe he changed into money, suffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedy this mischiefe the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adioyning parts of their owne Country, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among priuate men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this vproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured vpon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amyclæ, & finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other seruices, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserues to be remembred, as a thing very strange and maruailous. He had with too much courage aduentured to set vpon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken vp senseless, and carried away prisoner, with fifty of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caue into which the Spartans vsed to cast head-long, such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adiudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their fals; Aristomenes (howsoeuer it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceiued by some smal glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himselfe, that this beast must needes know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, saued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loose, ran through an hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delue so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitiues of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captaines slaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beleeued, that Aristomenes was aliue indeed.

Thus eleuen yeares passed whilest the enemies houering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asked him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leaue their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest reſt did; as for Ariſtomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would ſtirre, in ſuch a darke rainie night as this was. The ſlaue that heard theſe tidings, roſe vp ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Campe with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Maſter, commanding in the Kings abſence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was preſently taken; and the extreame darkneſſe, together with the noiſe of winde and raine, hindered all directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruell fight; one part being incited, by meere hope of ending a long worke; the other enraged by meere deſperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the aſſiſtance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of ſeruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrowneſſe of the ſtreetes and other paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continuall toyle; their Enemies fought in courſe, refreſhing themſelues with meate and ſleepe, and then returning ſupplyed the place of their weary fellowes with freſh Companions. Ariſtomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as hauing beene three dayes, and three nights vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger and thirſt, beſides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker ſort, whom he compaſſed round with armed men, and ſo attempted to breake out through the midſt of the Enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedæmonians vvas glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his Souldiers to giue an open way, leauing a faire paſſage to theſe deſperate madmen. So they iſſued forth, and arriued ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt louingly entertained.

Vpon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelues to the reſcue: but Ariſtocrates their falſe-hearted King, ſaid it was too late, for that all was already loſt. When Ariſtomenes had placed his followers in ſafety, he choſe out fiue hundred the luſtieſt of his men, with whom he reſolued to march in all ſecret haſte vnto Sparta, hoping to finde the Towne ſecure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the ſpoile of Meſſene. In this enterprize, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to ioyne with him; but Ariſtocrates marred all, by ſending ſpeedy aduertiſement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiſtle which Anaxander ſent back to Ariſtocrates, was intercepted by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſhood, which being publiſhed in open aſſembly, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting forth his body vnburied, erected a monument of his treachery, with a note: That the Periurer cannot deceiue God.

Of Ariſtomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his people to the charge of his Son Gorgus & other ſufficient Gouernours, who ſhould plant them in ſome new ſeate abroad, he reſolued himſelfe to make aboad in thoſe parts, hoping to finde the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he beſtowed honorably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the beſt man in Greece. Finally, Ariſtomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to haue trauailed vnto Ardys the Sonne of Gyges King of Lydia, & to Phraortes King of Media: but death preuented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whoſe great Grandfather was a Meſſenian, and went into Italy after the former warre) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italy, to take his part againſt the Zanclæans in Sicily, on the other ſide of the Streights. They did ſo; and winning the Towne of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keeps to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian warre ended in the firſt yeare of the twenty eight Olympiad. Long after which time, the reſt of that Nation, who ſtaying at home ſerued the Lacedæmonians, found meanes to rebell; but were ſoone vanquiſhed, and being driuen to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their antient Countrie-men into Italy and Sicily; some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselues a seate.

It is very strange, that during two hundred & foureſcore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, & loue of their forsaken Country, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third year of the hundred & second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, hauing tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, reuoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore vnto them their old possession, & help them in building a faire City; which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Booke of Iudith. Of the historie of Iudith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding vnto his father Gyges, began his reigne of nine and forty yeares, in the second of the fiue and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching vpon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus & Smyrna. In like manet Ardys wan Priene, & assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, ouerran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchilde, by whom they were driuen out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but wan the City of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long reigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last yeare of Manasses his reigne ouer Iuda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fifty of these fiue & fifty years in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had giuen to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the wholesome seuerity of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity; that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiesty, which his predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweene this king, and such as were before him, seemes to haue bred that opinion which Herodotus deliuers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

Herod. lib. 1.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the story of Iudith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same accompt, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slaine, and Holofernes sent to worke wonders vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioces to haue been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reigne of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this booke of Iudith to a certaine time, there hath much labour been ſpent with ill ſucceſſe. The reignes of Cambyſes, Darius Hyſtaſpis, Xerxes, and Ochus, haue beene ſought into; but afford no great matter of likelihood: & now of late, the times foregoing the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, haue beene thought vpon, and this age that we haue in hand, choſen by Bellarmine, as agreeing beſt with the ſtory; though others herein cannot (I ſpeak of ſuch as faine would) agree with him. Whileſt Cambyſes reigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the ſtory of Iudith, is found ſtanding and dedicated. The other two Perſian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to haue beene very fauourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonoſor, whoſe part they refuſed to take, & who ſent to deſtroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath ſome conueniences, aptly fitting this Hiſtory; and aboue all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whoſe iudgement the authority of this Booke were of no value) hauing placed this argument in the Perſian Monarchy, inclines the matter to the reigne of his vaineglorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the buſineſſe. Manifeſt it is, and granted, that in the time of this Hiſtory, there muſt be a returne from captiuity lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Ioacim High Prieſt; & a long peace of threeſcore and ten yeares or thereabout, enſuing. All theſe were to be among the Iewes. Likewiſe on the other ſide, we muſt finde a King that reigned in Nineue, eighteene yeares at the leaſt; that vanquiſhed & ſlew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refuſed to aſſiſt; one that ſought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of ſuch as were accounted gods, to be deſtroyed; one whoſe Vice-roy, or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewiſh Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all theſe circumſtances; the Prieſthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuity; are found concurring, with either the time of Manaſſes before the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reigne of Xerxes; the reſt of circumſtances requiſite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuity of the Iewes, & deſolation of the City. Wherefore the briefe deciſion of this controuerſie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was poſſible in ſo deſperate a caſe. For he ſuppoſeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reſtored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonoſor might be another. This granted; he addes, that from the twelfth yeare to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonoſor, that is fiue or ſixe yeares, the abſence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he ſuppoſeth to haue beene ſo long) might giue occaſion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonoſor hauing vanquiſhed and ſlaine Arphaxad, might then ſeeke to make himſelfe Lord of all, by the Army which he ſent forth vnto Holofernes. So ſhould the Iewes haue done their duty, in adhering to Xerxes their Soueraigne Lord, and reſiſting one that rebelled againſt him; as alſo, the other circumſtances rehearſed before, be well applied to the argument. For in theſe times, the affaires of Iury were agreeable to the Hiſtory of Iudith, and ſuch a King as this ſuppoſed Nabuchodonoſor, might well enough be ignorant of the Iewes, & as proud as we ſhall need to thinke him. But the ſilence of all Hiſtories, takes away beliefe from this coniecture: and the ſuppoſition it ſelfe is very hard, that a Rebell, whoſe King was abroad, with an Army conſiſting of ſeuenteene hundred thouſand men, ſhould preſume ſo farre, vpon the ſtrength of twelue hundred thouſand foot, and twelue thouſand Archers on horſebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he liſt, yea that there was none other God than himſelfe. It is indeede eaſie to finde enough that might be ſaid againſt this deuice of Torniellus: yet if there were any neceſſity of holding the booke of Iudith, to be Canonicall, I would rather chooſe to lay aſide all regard of prophane Hiſtories, and build ſome defence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it ſelf. That Iudith liued vnder none of the Perſian Kings, Bellarmine (whoſe workes I haue not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath proued by many arguments. That ſhe liued not in the Reigne of Manaſſes, Torniellus hath proued very ſubſtantially, ſhewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in ſaying that the text was corrupted, where it ſpake of the deſtruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonoſor, chodonoſor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantaſie, it is ſo plaine that it needes no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truely ſay, that they, which haue contended about the time of this Hiſtory, being well furniſhed of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themſelues (like naked men in a ſtony field) haue chaſed Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni ſoliſque vias, in an age that neuer was, and in places that were neuer known.

Iudith c. 2. ver. 23. & 25. Surely, to finde out the borders of Iapheth, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabia; or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Coſmographers, as the former queſtion hath done Chronologers. But I will not buſie my ſelfe herewith; hauing already ſo farre digreſſed, in ſhewing who liued not with Manaſſes, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearſe what others I finde, to haue had their part, in the long time of his Reigne.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in theſe times.

THE firſt yeare of Manaſſes was the laſt of Romulus; after whoſe death, one yeare the Romanes wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne choſen; a peaceable man and ſeeming very religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to ſome good ciuility, and a more orderly faſhion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with ſuperſtition; as perſwading them, that he had familiarity with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which he deliuered vnto the Romanes as things of great importance. But all theſe deuices of Numa were, in his owne iudgement, no better than meere deluſions that ſerued onely as rudiments to bring the ſauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one body by Romulus, to ſome forme of milder diſcipline, than their boyſterous and wilde natures was otherwiſe apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Books that were found in his graue, almoſt ſixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superſtition taught by himſelfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Cheſts of ſtone were in it, with an inſcription in Greeke and Latine letters, which ſaid, That Numa Pompilius the ſon of Pompo, King of the Romanes lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being vtterly conſumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of waxe; of his owne conſtitutions ſeuen, and other ſeuen of Philoſophy. They were not only vncorrupted, but in a manner freſh and new. The Pretour of the City deſiring to haue a ſight of theſe Books, when he perceiued whereunto they tended, refuſed to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a ſolemn oath that they were againſt the Religion then in vſe. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It ſeemes that Numa did meane to acquite himſelfe vnto wiſer ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene ſo fooliſh as to beleeue the Doctrine wherein he inſtructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyſon wherewith he had infected Rome, when hee ſate in his Throne, had not left working, when he miniſtred the Antidote out of his graue. Had theſe Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Ceſar, when the miſte of ignorance was ſomewhat better diſcuſſed; likely it is that they had not only eſcaped the fire, but wrought ſome good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they ſerued as a confutation, without remedy, of Idolatry that was inueterate.

Numa reigned three and forty yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hoſtilius the third King was choſen, in the ſixe and fortieth of Manaſſes, and reigned two and thirty yeares, buſied, for the moſt part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cauſe to feare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuſcanes, cauſed them to bethinke themſelues of a courſe, whereby without effuſion of ſo much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemy, it might be decided, who ſhould command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twins borne at one birth (Dionysius saies that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their seuerall Countries. The end was, that the Horatij, Champions for the Romanes got the victory, though two of them first lost their liues. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Liuie tels it) were all aliue, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horatius, pretending feare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slue them, as it had beene in single fight, man after man, ere they could ioyne together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were giuen and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatij was slaine, then one of the Curatij, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatij, whom the third Horatius did cunningly seuer the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman History, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in a wager, against Alba, and in respect of the great increase which therby the Roman State obtained. For the City of Alba did immediatly become subiect vnto her owne Colony, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remoued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother City, had been chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subiect vnto it, & diuers petty States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbeare to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, & few of them remarkeable considered apart by themselues) vntill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancy, shall grow to be the main subiect of this History.

The seuenth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Gouernours for ten yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I finde only names; Leocrates, Absander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Gouernours for ten yeares, were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, & from terme of life reduced vnto ten years; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to liue priuate men vnder the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeares of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall Table, following this worke, doth set them. For he not only professeth himselfe to haue taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted alwaies the years of the Greeks, how they did answer vnto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this History. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yeare of the seuenth Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeare of Charops gouernment of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

Dion. Halic. lib. 1. fol. 43. & 45.

In the reigne of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to haue had Asses eares, held the kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him; especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold: by which meanes he had like to haue beene starued (his meate and drinke being subiect to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from this miserable faculty, by causing him to wash himselfe in the Riuer Pactolus, the streame whereof hath euer since, forsooth, abounded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Buls bloud; being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) obserued the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians hauing obtained some power by Sea, founded Macicratis a City on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to haue assisted them, who vsed all meanes of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colony in Egypt by force.

About

Plut. & Eusеb. About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians founded Syracusæ in Sicily, a City in after-times exceeding famous.

* Whence in Strabo there is sinus Astacenus a part of Propontis where this City standeth. Paus. l. 5. Hal. l. 3. Strabo l. 6. The City of Nicomedia sometime* Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, liued much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusæ. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

Iustin. l. 3. Paus. l. 10. About the same time the Parthenians being of age, & banished Lacedæmon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italy; where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iustine and Pausanias finde it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the city Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the region of the Vmbri, now Vrbin in Italy. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therfore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to haue bin done in the fine and fifty yeares of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reseruing only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Ierusalem.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Iosias.

2 Kings 21. 2 Chron. 33. Ammon the sonne of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conuersion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his owne seruants against him: who slew him after he had reigned two years. Philo, Eusebius, and Nicephorus giue him ten yeares, following the Septuagint.

2 Kings 22. 2 Chron. 34. Iosias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a childe of 8. yeares old, he began to seek after the God of Dauid his Father; and in his twelfth yeare he purged Iuda and Ierusalem from the high places; and the groues, and the carued and molten Images: and they brake downe in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophecied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be born vnto the house of Dauid, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense vpon thee: a prophecy very remarkeable.

1 Kings 13.

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, he rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomy, or, of the Law which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the seuere commandements therein written, the prosperity promised to those that obserue them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Hhldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book, who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring euill vpon this place, and vpon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curses that are written in the Booke, which they haue read before the King of Iuda, because they haue forsaken mee, and burnt incense to other gods. Only for the king himselfe, because he was a louer of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this euill should not fall on Iuda and Ierusalem in his daies, but that he himselfe should inherit his graue in peace. 2 Kings 22. 15; 2 Chron. 34.

Iosias assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to be read vnto them, made a couenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promising thereby to obserue the Lawes and Commandements in the Book contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to haue extended vnto those Countries, that had beene part of the kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victory of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vse the aduantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himself vnable to deale with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Towne held out nine and twenty yeares) did giue vnto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himselfe could not easily defend. This was a good way to breake the amity that the kings of Iuda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, & withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Iewes, which had been lost by iniuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliuerance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places deliuered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much paines, in making Ierusalem it selfe more defensible; yet I should rather beleeue, that he, hauing already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he trauelled in making such prouisions, only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the king of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly tearmes, as required not only a faithfull obseruation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could suffice to make Iosias sit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Neco king of Egypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. 2 Chron. 33. 14.

The last yeare of Iosias his reigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Iudæa, determining to passe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that Riuer about Carchemish, or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diocletian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to haue done,) or perhaps to inuade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the trauaile of Psammiticus had not been idlely consumed about that one Towne of Azotus; but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damasco. 2 Chron. 35. 20.

Neither was the industry of Neco lesse than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which war, two things may greatly haue auailed the Egyptians, & aduanced their affaires & hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greeks, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it selfe could afford; and the danger wherin Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which vnder the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more conuenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Egypt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, hauing their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Iosias aduised with himselfe to which of these he might adhere, hauing his Territory set in the mid-way between both, so as the one could not inuade the other; but that they must of necessity tread vpon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadours, a Chron.35. leaue to passe along by Iudæa, protesting that he directed himselfe against the Assyrians only, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacon, or Sous King of Egypt, was vtterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life & estate, which the Assyrian so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fel vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and fourteenth yeares of Ezekia, whilest that good king and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew the ill assurance, that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbors though they were) were alwaies vnready, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craued that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Army, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabulassar vpon his owne borders, left vnto the Iewes a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to giue it any checke vpon the way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iosias, was not stirred vp only by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in faith & honour, to do his best in defence of the Babylonian Crowne; wherunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Iuda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their Enemy.

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrary to the aduice of Ieremy the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecy of Ieremy, nor can finde reason to beleeue. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might beleeue that an enterprize grounded vpon fidelity and thankfulnesse due to the king of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednes of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of Iosias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined that their good King, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should giue an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauying all the strength he could make neare vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Neco: and there he receiued the stroake of death, which lingring about him till he came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the People and Princes of Iuda, especially of Ieremy the Prophet: who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Booke of Lamentations. Lam.4.20.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Iosias: Of Iehoahaz and Iehoiakim Kings of Israel.

OF these warres, and particularly of this victory, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should haue reached aboue an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should haue the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toylesome businesse twelue hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and and leauied a great Army, wherewith he marched against the king of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the seruice, as well of his Nauy, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue only this victory against Iosias, where Herodotus cals the place Magdolus, and the Iewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Iudæa was a Prouince of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to haue bin the same place (though diuersly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Necus tooke the City of Cadytis, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a maner, of all Syria, as Iosephus witnesseth. Ioſ Ant. Iud. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subiects, & that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting saile from the gulfe of Arabia, & so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corne for their sustenance; in that long voyage which lasted three yeares. This was the first Nauigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discouered; which after was forgotten, vntil Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars & streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gybraltar, hauing Africke still on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same streights, leaue Africke on the Larboord, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeue, how the Sun in this iournie was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth; & the obseruation then made hereof, makes me the better to beleeue, that such a voyage was indeed performed. Herod. l. 4.

But leauing these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were busie at Carchemish, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremy calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Reigne of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Iosias: Wherfore it may seem that he was set vp as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appeares by the sequele. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his busines in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudæa. This Country was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himselfe came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The City of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappy to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may be obserued in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, since hee could no better vse it. But how-euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributary, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stout to giue him peace, when hee desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater taske lying vpon his hands, than would permit him to waste his forces vpon Iudæa: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Carchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to haue stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gaue him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet he did forbeare to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Iewes had suffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driuen of necessity to forsake that party, and to ioyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselues faithfull, who could blame them? It was therfore enough to reclaime them; seeing they were such a people as would not vpon euery occasion shift side, but endure more, than Pharaoh, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheless he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so hee might both reape at the present some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of 2 Kings 34. 32. Ier. 22. 32.

greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the vnfortunate king Iehoahaz, who died in his Captiuity.

The reigne of Iehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Iehoiakim, his successour, did reigne ten whole yeares; wheras the Scriptures giue him eleuen, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to be vnworthy of disputation; and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impiety was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as hauing receiued his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the euill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparant, that the poyson wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnes of Iosias, but that it still cleaued vnto the chiefe of the people, Yea vnto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royall authority was much abased by the dangers wherein the Country stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbeare to professe, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell, as we finde by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe appeare to haue been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods iudgements against the City and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrary to the custome vsed, both in those daies, & since among all ciuill Nations, of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankinde should be exempted from all priuiledge.

It concerned Pharao to giue all contentment possible to Iehoiakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeares, began about these times, to roare so loud vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatning to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the house of Merodach, from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not giue attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to lose that Prouince.

Merodach the sonne of Baladan, who taking the aduentage that Sennacherib's miscaduenture and death, together with the dissention betweene his children presented, made himselfe king of Babylon, was eleuen years troubled with a powerfull Enemy Asarhaddon the sonne of Sennacherib, reigning ouer the Assyrians in Nineue; from whom whilest he could not any other way diuert his cares, he was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reigne following, & his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iosephus giues him the honour of hauing wonne Nineue it selfe; which we may beleeue; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soone following, that great City was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation:

and refuſed afterwards to continue ſubiect, when the Kings, being of the Chaldæan race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Aſſyrian King, whoſe Captaines tooke Manaſſes priſoner; but I rather beleeue thoſe that hold the contrary, for which I haue giuen my reaſons in due place. To ſay truth, I finde little cauſe why Merodach ſhould haue looked into thoſe parts, as long as the Iewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themſelues quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Pſammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reigne, or the beginning of his ſon.

Ben Merodach the ſon and ſucceſſour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is he named by good conſent of Authors, and that ſpeake little of his doings. The length of his Reigne is gathered by inference to haue beene one and twenty yeares; for ſo much remaineth of the time that paſſed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Reignes (which is a knowne ſumme) deducting the yeares of his Father, and of his ſonne Nabulaſſar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manaſſes Priſoner, and releaſed him. He ſped ill in Syria, where Pſammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greekes, did much preuaile. This may haue been ſome cauſe that he releaſed Manaſſes, and did put into his hands ſome part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumſtances alleadged before.

Nabulaſſar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater buſineſs in his owne Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: inſomuch as it may be thought to haue been a great negligence or ouer-ſight of Pſammiticus and Necò, that they did not occupy ſome good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Aſſyria, and beſieged Nineue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulaſſar, but conſtrained to remoue by the comming of the Scythians, who in theſe ages did ouer-flow thoſe parts of the world, laying hold vpon all that they could maſter by ſtrong hand. Of theſe Scythians, and the Lordſhip that they held in Aſia, it is conuenient that I ſpeak in this place, ſhewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they firſt fell, were buſied in the ſame times with hopes of conquering Aſſyria.

Phraortes, the ſonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, hauing by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceiued at length a faire poſſibility of making himſelfe Lord of Nineue.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) hauing been a Soueraigne Lady, was not forſaken of all her dependants; yet remained in ſuch caſe, that of her ſelfe ſhe was well enough. Herod. l. 1.

This makes it plain, that howſoeuer Merodach had gotten poſſeſſion of this imperiall ſeat, and made it ſubiect as was the reſt of the Country; yet it found the meanes to ſet it ſelfe at liberty: as after this againe he did, when it had been regained by Nabulaſſar his Grand-childe.

Sharpe warre, and the very nouelty of ſuddaine violence, vſe to diſmay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but cuſtome of danger hardeneth euen thoſe that are vnwarlike. Nineue had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had ſuffered, and reſiſted, all the fury, wherewith either Domeſticall tumults between the ſons of Sennacherib, or forreigne warre of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore is the leſſe wonderfull, that Phraortes did ſpeed ſo ill in his iourney againſt it. He and the moſt of his Army periſhed in that expedition: whereof I finde no particular circumſtances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a leſſe power than was needfull). It is enough, that herein we may beleeue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the ſonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of war than his Father, wan as much of Aſia the leſſe, as lay Eaſtward, from the Riuer of Halys; hee ſought reuenge vpon the Aſſyrians for the death of his father, & beſieged Nineue it ſelfe, hauing a purpoſe to deſtroy it. I rather beleeue Euſebius, That hee tooke the City, and fulfilled his diſpleaſure vpon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came vpon him whileſt hee lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Euſebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet hauing ſeen other Authors that are now loſt, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it beſt, to yeeld vnto the beſt likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whileſt he lay before Nineue, were to accuſe him of greater improuidence, than ought to be ſuſpected in one commended as a good ſouldier. But to ſuppoſe that he was fame to leaue the Towne, when a Warre ſo dangerous fell vpon his owne Country, doth well agree both with the condition of ſuch buſineſſe as that Scythian expedition brought into thoſe parts, and with the State of the Chaldæan and Aſſyrian affaires enſuing.

The deſtruction of this great City is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there ſet downe as happening about theſe times; of which booke whoſoeuer was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the Story of thoſe ages, and hath committed no ſuch errour in reckoning of times, as ſhould cauſe vs to diſtruſt him in this. As for the Propheſie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine terme, yet it appeares to haue taken effect, in the finall deſtruction of Nineue by Nabuchodonoſor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conqueſt of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will ſpeake in due place. Some that aſcribe more authority than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of neceſſity, to affirme, that about theſe times, Nineue was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victory ouer it to Ben Merodach: a needleſſe coniecture, if the place of Euſebius be well conſidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulaſſar the ſon of Ben Merodach, did ſeize vpon it, & place a King or Vice-roy therin, about ſuch time as the Country of Aſſyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre ouer-whelmed Media. For then was the Conqueſt wrought out ready to his hand; the ſwelling ſpirits of the Nineuites were allayed, & their malice to Babylon ſo much aſſwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulaſſar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confuſion, this vnthankfull People and their King rebelled againe, as ſhall be ſhewed in the Reigne of Nabuchodonoſor.

§. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Aſia eight and twenty yeeres.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

NOW that I haue ſhewed what impediment was giuen by the Aſſyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much diſabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I ſpeake of that great Scythian expedition, which grieuouſly afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes & Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in ſuch wiſe, that part of the trouble redounded euen to the Egyptians themſelues. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large diſcourſe, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with conſent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needleſſe to recite them; for they are farre enough diſtant from the buſineſſe in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may ſeeme very ſtrange, needeth ſome anſwer in this place: leſt otherwiſe I ſhould either ſeeme to make my ſelfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or elſe to be too forgetfull of my ſelfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, thoſe perſons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty yeares, he ſaith, that the Scythians reigned in Aſia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Country from them. Yet hee reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the ſiege of Nineue; the ſiege of Nineue being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquiſhed the Medes, did paſſe into Syria, and were encountred in Paleſtina by Pſammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. Theſe narrations of Herodotus may, euery one of them, be true; though not in ſuch order of time, as he hath marſhalled them. For Pſammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reigne: and Cyaxares had ſpent halfe of his forty yeares, ere Haliattes was King of Lydia; ſo that hee could not, after thoſe Lydian Warres, reigne eight and twenty yeares together with the Scythians. It is true, that Euſebius doth alſo call Pſammis the ſonne of Pharao Neco, by the name of Pſammiticus; and this King Pſammis may, by ſome ſtrained coniecture, be thought to haue beene he that met with the Scythians: for he liued

with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palæstina, to Psammiticus the Father of Necho, whom he leaues dead before the Reigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relye vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to beleeue him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them downe.

It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in diuers places: a worke necessary, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in a generall History; yet not easie, the consent of those that haue written thereof, being nothing neare to vniformity.

I haue noted before, that in the reigne of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouerran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, vntill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardys, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to finde the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned ouer Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperity, we must needs allow more than one or two of his last yeares vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reigne in Lydia, being three and twenty yeares compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaues the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meete the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must haue receiued ere they could be driuen quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reigne of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should haue aduentured the strength of his Kingdome against the Egyptians and Iewes, had he stood in daily feare of losing his owne, to a more mighty Nation, that lay vpon his necke? To speake simply as it appeares to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troopes, that infested their seuerall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar hauing the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northerne Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reigne, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iournie.

TOuching the expedition it self, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Country by the Scythians, inuaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not contended with hauing won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remoued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischieuous and fooliſh; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countri-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grieuously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of diuers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose re-flow did ouerwhelm no small portion of Greece & Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to haue spoken, of all Goropius his workes, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we finde it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; how soeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their diuers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neare vnto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darkneſſe; certain it is that he would haue them near neighbours to Hell: for he had the ſame quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would haue made them ſeeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to inſert into his works the names of ſuch as liued in his owne time, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelfe deſerued. And for this reaſon it is proued by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Country. Perhaps that inuaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, wherof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to haue happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons & the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Aſia; which though it be not in expreſſe tearmes written, that they did with ioynt-forces, yet ſeeing they inuaded the ſelfe-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them aſſiſtance. The ſame Authour, before his entry into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to haue beene wiues of the Scythians, and no leſſe Warre-like than their Husbands; alledging the example of that Queen who is ſaid to haue ſlaine the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wiues along with them to the Warres; and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe Women; the terrible deſcent of them into Italy, when Marius the Romane ouerthrew them, giues proofe ſufficient. I will not here enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; another place will giue me better leiſure to ſpeake of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by diuers Hiſtorians to haue belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approue Goropius his concluſion, That theſe three Nations were one, at leaſt that they were neare allies.

Now as concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to haue beene none other than the ſending a Colony of them forth into Aſia, with an Army of Scythians to helpe them, in purchaſing a new ſeate, and eſtabliſhing the plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were companions in this iourney. For the City of Nouogrod in Ruſſia (which Country is the ſame that was called Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon be further ſhewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame people made fiue hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the Lake Mæotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie aboue three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer many Countries, beating all downe before them; and finally, thinking to haue ſetled themſelues in Italy, they diuided their Company, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Conſuls. Meere neceſſity enforced theſe poore Nations to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard aduentures. For their Country being more fruitfull of men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut vp on the North ſide with intolerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their ouer-ſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to driue others out of poſſeſſion, as hauing title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more ciuill, people had. Their ſturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardneſſe, gaue them great aduantage ouer ſuch as were accuſtomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore moſt commonly they preuailed very farre; their next neighbours giuing them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be ridde of them; others giuing them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

†. III.

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THe first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leauing on the other side, & behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Pontus, and being arriued in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnseruiceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their carriages, vnder some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vtmost hazzard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of their impediments, leauing them in a place of strength, where Antwerpe now stands, when they drew neare vnto Gaule, vpon which they determined to aduenture themselues in the purchase. From Sinope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines, or any deep Riuers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed. Herod. Lib. 4.

What battels were fought between these inuaders and the Lydians, & with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardes the capitall City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I obserue, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this inuasion, and by Halyattes and Crœsus in the times following; all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, & all, saue burning the Milesians Corne fields, that was done in twelue years by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are neuer so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their owne seats, labour to root out the established possessours of another Land, making roome for themselues, their wiues and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other seruices and acknowledgements; which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had been quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants haue, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, euen to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their liues without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such inuasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witnesse the diuersity of Conquests; hauing by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Ciuill Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was, as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian bloud) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seem that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the higher Asia, did arriue vnto. So that by considering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceiue the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could driue them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance euen of vtter enmity, had bred such acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of both theſe people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their diſagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no ſmall number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great ſlaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Country wide enough to receiue them, as hauing disburthened it ſelfe of many thouſands, that were ſent to ſeeke their graues abroad. And ſuch (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though ſome victory of Halyattes may haue haſtened the concluſion, yet the wearieſome length of time ſeems to haue done moſt, in compelling them to deſire of reſt. I know not why I ſhould feare to adde hereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was ſo compounded between the Cimmerians & Halyattes, that the Riuer of Halys ſhould diuide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eaſterne ſide of the Riuer was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whoſe wiues and daughters theſe warlike women are ſuppoſed to haue been.

And hereunto the quarrell enſuing betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is ſaid) fought in defence of certain Scythians, vpon whom the Median ſought reuenge. And it ſtands with reaſon, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall ſlaughters, ſhould haue ioyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common ſafety: though otherwiſe it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome ſo farre Weſtward, whatſoeuer the pretences might be, of taking reuenge vpon ſuch as had ſpoiled each of their Countries. As for that occaſion of the Warre betweene theſe two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I finde it of little waight, and leſſe probability. He tells of Scythians, that being chaſed out of their Country by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to bee inſtructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archery. Now it ſo fell out (ſaith he) that theſe Scythians vſing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home ſomewhat with them, did neuertheleſſe other-whiles miſſe of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was vnder their charge, whom dreſſing like Veniſon, they preſented vnto him; which done, they fledde vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a Warre that laſted ſixe yeares between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding theſe Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other refuſing to betray ſuch men as were become his ſuppliants. To this I will ſay no more, than that I ſee no cauſe that might induce the Scythians to betake themſelues to either of theſe Kings, vnto whom their Nation had wrought ſo much diſpleaſure. Particularly, they had reaſon to diſtruſt Cyaxares, for the treachery that he ſhewed in the maſſacring of their Countri-men that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that we ſhould ſpeake.

†. IV.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Aſia.

AS the Cimmerians held their courſe weſterly, along the ſhores of the Euxine ſea: ſo the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and hauing the Caſpian Sea on their left hand, paſſed between it and Caucaſus through Albania, Colthene, & other obſcure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia, & ſo they entered into Media. The Medes encountred them in Armes; but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whileſt Pſammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the ſixth yeare of Nabulaſſars Reigne ouer Babylon (ſuppoſing him to haue reigned fiue & thirty; otherwiſe we muſt allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeares of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonoſor was King; ſo giuing him good leaue to prouide ſecurely for the inuaſion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet liued, as Ioſephus out of Beroſus relates the Hiſtory.

Now the Medes, deſirous to ſaue themſelues as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no luſt to a ſecond trial of the ſword, refuſed not to vndergoe goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serue to remoue these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselues to be perswaded, that a little more trauaile would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relyed so much vpon their owne valour, that they feared no resistance; & being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was neare enough, whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours haue cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not reade. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest between Media and Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well beleeue, that they watered their horses in his Riuers, and that he also was content to giue them prouender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the iealous Husband of a faire Wife) took care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detaine them there, than any force or perswasion that he could vse, would send them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Army that should keepe them backe. Egypt was rich; and halfe the riches had not been ill spent in saiing all. Yet Psammiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palæstina: whence he neuer aduanced to meete with the Scythians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could beate vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts; which were likely to worke so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammiticus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill haue endured to pursue him through vnknowne waies, had they fought with him and preuailed: especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary iourney. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that he preserued his owne Estate from a dangerous aduenture, by hyring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the processe of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than euer troubled themselues with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resoluing now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they presumed to liue at discretion vpon the Country, taking what they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed ouer the higher Asia, that is, ouer the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those priuate men, to whose wealth any Scythian did beare a fancy, would haue lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aliue, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heauiest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Country not farre from their own home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolued to proue what might be done by stratagem: Herod. lib. 1.

ſtratagem. The managing of the buſineſſe is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feaſted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and ſlew them; recouering hereby the poſſeſſion of all that they had loſt.

Such another ſlaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was reuenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelty than euer they had practiſed before. That the Scythians which eſcaped this bloudy feaſt, made any ſtirre in Media, I do not find; neither do I reade that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuaſion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more ſtrange, for that the Army returning home out of Media, was very ſtrong, & encountred with oppoſition (as Herodotus reports it) no leſſe than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Country, tooke good effect, with leſſe bloud-ſhed than hath been ſuppoſed. For if he ſurpriſed all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compoſition. Many of them doubtleſſe in eight and twenty years had ſo well ſetled themſelues, that they were deſirous of reſt, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country; many (of whom I ſhall ſpeake anon) hauing done what they could in the buſineſſe, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home with what they had gotten; ſuch as were not pleaſed with either of theſe two courſes, might goe ioyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or ſeeke their fortunes in other Prouinces among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are ſaid to haue bin with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderſtood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or deſire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become ſubiect vnto Nabuchadnezzar: mens loue of their wealth being moſt effectuall, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as euer after, ſo in his firſt beginning of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had been accuſtomed to deale with the Babylonians after another faſhion: & this new ſucceſſe of that King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to ſuch addition as this of new forces.

Ier. 25. 9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, diuers Authors report a Story, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to aſſiſt their kinred and friends, in acquiring a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing their plantation. For theſe had left their wiues behinde them; a good argument to proue that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themſelues in their husbands abſence, became bed-fellows to their ſlaues. Theſe got a luſty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, and therfore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were onely the children of ſlaues, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it muſt needes be that they were very Boyes, or elſe that the Women did very little while continue chaſte. Wherefore I rather beleeue that tale as it is told by the Ruſſes themſelues, who agreeing in the reſt with the conſent of Hiſtories, make that report of their Anceſtors returning homewards, which I will ſet down, as I finde it in Maſter Doctor Fletcher his exact diſcourſe of the Ruſſe Common-wealth. They vnderſtood by the way, that their Chriſtolopey, or Bond-ſlaues, whom they left at home, had in their abſence poſſeſſed their Townes, Lands, Houſes, Wiues, and all. At which newes being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdaining the Villany of their ſeruants, they made the more ſpeede home: and ſo not farre from Nouogrod met them in warlike manner marching againſt them. Whereupon aduiſing what was beſt to be done, they agreed alſo to ſet vpon them with no other ſhew of weapon but with their horſe-whips (which, as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their ſeruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, and laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the onſet: which ſeemed ſo terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and ſtrooke ſuch a ſenſe into them of the ſmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheepe before the Driuers. In memory of this victory, the Nouogradians euer ſince haue ſtamped their Coine (which they call a Dingo Nouogradskoy, currant through all Ruſſia) with the figure of a Horſeman ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may ſeeme, that all the women of that Country haue fared the worſe euer ſince, in regard of their vniuerſall fault: for ſuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified thoſe ſlaues, curiouſly wrought by her ſelfe, is the firſt preſent that the Moſcouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, ſends to him that ſhall be her husband, in token of ſubiection; being well well assured to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Nouograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselues any more so long from their wiues; which after this, I finde not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition, not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appeares to haue been a great cause of the Egyptians preuailing hitherto in Syria, and about Iudæa, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes liuing in diuers Countries, in these ages.

HAuing thus far digressed from the matters of Iuda, to auoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I haue spoken as much as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeare of Iosias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned foure and twenty yeares. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, preuailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the kingdome to himself, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeare of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty yeares. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedæmonians bethinking them how to be auenged of the Arcadians, who gaue succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidæ, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about these times, & gouerned it in peace thirty yeares, leauing for successour his sonne Periander, one of the seauen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his owne wife, & afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparrell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisedome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could be admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus & Draco, famous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to haue written them with bloud: for he rewarded euery small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, & power giuen to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, vnlesse it were when she was dronke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her selfe vp in immodest brauery, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of iustice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, he did not cause him to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to saue the young man (who also lost one) from vtter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth neede so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldæans will soon fall vnder the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successiuely present themselues, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeares, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Ierusalem, wee finde little matter, wherin the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet read we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neare distance; all which must haue beene quite omitted, or else reserued vnto a very vnseasonable rehearsall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Iudæa, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldæans.

NOw, to returne to the Iewish Story, from whence we haue so farre digressed. In the third yeare of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudæa with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despight of Necho, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Iehoiakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Iudæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazzard himselfe and his Army, it being a Country of an euill affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horse-men in his Army; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Country, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome; before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeare came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this yeare the Babylonian lying vpon the Bank Euphrates (his owne Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arriuall of Necho. There, after a resolued contention for victory, Necho was slaine, and his Army remaining forced to saue it selfe; which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recouered all Syria, and whatsoeuer the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Egyptian, yet hauing made his peace with the Chaldæan the yeare before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reseruednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammis, who succeeded vnto Necho, began to thinke vpon restoring Iehoahaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp as a Domesticall Enemy, against his vngratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Iudæan had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second yeare of his owne Reigne, when the Boy was but eight yeares old. As for this rumour of Iehoahaz his returne, the Prophet Ieremy foretold, that it should proue idle, saying: He shall not returne thither, but he shall dye in the place whither they haue led him captiue, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeede, hauing spent all their Mercenary forces, and receiued that heauy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis Apries, who reigning after Psammis, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazzard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with braue words, telling such friuolous tales, as men that meant to doe nothing, vse, of their glorious acts fore-passed, against Iosias & Iehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Iehoiakim to giue them satisfaction, by letting them vnderstand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfe a Subiect, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudæan lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would haue him. So he continued in the

the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three yeares. At this time Ieremy the Prophet cried out against the Iewes, putting them in minde that he had now three and twenty yeares exhorted them to repentance, but becauſe they had ſtopt their eares againſt him, and the reſt of the Prophets, he now pronounced their captiuity at hand, and that they ſhould endure the yoke of bondage full ſeauenty yeares. The ſame calamity he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumæans, & the reſt; foretelling that they ſhould all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forſaken, and after the ſeauenty yeares expired, that the Babylonians themſelues ſhould taſte of the ſame Cup, and be vtterly ſubuerted by the Medes, and the Iudæans permitted to returne againe into their owne Fields and Cities. The firſt impriſonment of the Prophet Ieremy ſeemes to haue been in the fourth yeare of this Iehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he ſent to reade them vnto the People, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had firſt ſet Ieremie at liberty, and aduiſed him and Baruch to hide themſelues. Ier.25.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceiued the ill newes therin deliuered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and caſt it into the fire. All which Ieremie cauſed to be new written with this addition, that the dead body of Iehoiakim, ſhould be caſt out, expoſed in the day to the heat, & in the night to the froſt, and there ſhould be none of his ſeed to ſit on the Throne of Dauid.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim reſted ſecure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre oppoſed it ſelfe againſt the Chaldæan forces; & vpon iuſt confidence of her own ſtrength, deſpiſed all preparation that could be made againſt her. Now forasmuch as the terme of ſeuenty years was preſcribed vnto the deſolation, as wel of Tyre, as of Ieruſalem, & other townes and countries; it is apparant, that they which referre the expugnation of this City vnto the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonoſor, haue ſure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewiſe it followes of neceſſity, that the ſiege thereof began in the ſeauenth of his Reigne, as hauing laſted thirteen yeares.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the ſeuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath riſen much diſputation. The third yeare of Iehoiakim, was the laſt of Nabuloſſar, who being deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of ſuch as had reuolted from him vnto Pharao Necho, and ſent this Noble Prince his ſonne, with an Army into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the ſame yeare. The yeare next following, being the fourth of Iehoiakim, was the firſt of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremias numbreth in expreſſe words; and from this we reckon all his time & actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeare he conquered Egypt; and then began to reigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durſt offend him. The ſecond from this yeare it was, wherein he ſaw that viſion, of the Image conſiſting of ſundry Metals; which did prefigurate the ſucceſſion of great Kingdomes, that ſhould rule the Earth, before the comming of Chriſt. I will not ſtand to diſpute about this, which is the beſt concluſion that I finde, of long diſputations: but returne vnto the ſiege of Tyre, which began in the ſeauenth of his Reigne. Dan.1.1. Ier.25.1.

The City of Tyre couered all the ground of an Iſland, that was diuided from the maine, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldæans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, & skill to vſe them, excelled all other Nations; and euery winde, from one part or other, brought needfull proviſions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheleſſe the iudgements of God denounced againſt it by Eſay, Ieremie, Ezekiel, Eſay 23. had threatned the deſtruction, and the obſtinate reſolution of Nabuchodonoſor, had fully Ier.25. determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of reſiſtance, vndertook Ezek.26. a vaſt piece of worke, euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Iland from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus, that ſtood oppoſite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountain of Libanus near adioyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furniſh him with materials. Thirteene yeares were ſpent in this laborious, and almoſt hopeleſſe buſineſſe. Which needeth not ſeeme ſtrange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remayning of Nebuchadnezzars Peere, and being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seauen moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue, with much more violence could it ouerturn, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchadonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deep striuing as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant; whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Euery man knowes, God could haue furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes and the like) by making at least the Seas calme, & adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vse the hand of man, euen the hand of man striuing, as may seem, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessiue labour of the Chaldæans, Euery head was made bald, and euery shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

Ezech.29.

When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses receiued, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely) and so Iosephus reports it) some glorious rumours of the Egyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers; Iehoiakim renounced his subiection, & began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fel out. For Nabuchodonosor gaue him no leisure to doe much hurt, but with part of his Army marched directly into Iudæa, where the amazed king made so little resistance (the Egyptians hauing left him as it were in a dream) that he entred Ierusalem, & layed hands on Iehoiakim: whom he first bound & determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be deuoured by beasts and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leauing in his place, Iehoiakim or Iechonias his sonne; whom, after three moneths and ten daies, Nabuchodonosor remoued, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochæus and Iesedech the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his seruants, Eunuchs, and all the best men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captiues. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe, though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the euill that befell him, rather than the greater euill that he thereby auoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserue his Estate: for so we reade in generall words, that he did euill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathanias his Vncle in the kingdome of Iuda, & called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the Iustice of God. For like as Neco king of Egypt, had formerly displaced Ioachaz, after his Father Iosias was slaine, and set vp Iehoiakim the son of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Iehoiakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole brother to that Ioachaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gaue him, and called the liuing God to witnesse it: the same; that he would remaine assured to the kings of Chaldæa.

In the first yeare of Zedechias, Ieremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Iudæans that were carried away captiue, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremy wrote in a booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which booke at length he gaue to Sheraias, when he went with the king Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to read it to the Captiue Iewes, and then to binde it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the euill that I will bring vpon her. This iourney of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to haue been in way of submission, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some suit there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discountenanced. For, his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those vnquiet courses, from which Ieremy deterred both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appoint-appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent vnto the fiue Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they & the Kings of Iuda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enioy their own Countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also fore-told them, that those Vessels, which as yet remained in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should be restored againe.

The same yeare Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the woodden Chaine, which Ieremy wore, in signe of the Captiuity of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting; that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and giue an end to all these troubles. But Ieremy in stead of his woodden Yoke wore a Coller of yron: and in signe that Ananias had giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wauered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his Reigne he practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aides of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonish yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himselfe; but being confident of the helpe from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should be extirpate, vntill the comming of Silo (according to the prophecy of Iacob) he despised the words of Ieremy, and imprisoned him. For Ieremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carryed to Babel, die his naturall death.

Ierusalem, being the following yeare, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Army; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremy (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Iuda, with his Army, to succour Zedechias, of whose reuolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremy gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to haue any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them, that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldæans remoued from Ierusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leauing the poore people of Ierusalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremity, had manumised their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yeare of Iubile) and made them free therby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldæan Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former slauery. But the Chaldæes being returned to the siege, the Prophet Ieremy, when the State of Ierusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring him of his owne life, and the safety of the City, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelity and periury, had prouided for him.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some doe reckon it) or according to Iosephus eighteen, the Babylonian Army lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the City with woodden Towers, so as the besieged could neither sally out, nor receiue into the City any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, with high Towres raised vpon Mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions there-abouts, and had the Woods and Riuers to obey him, found means to ouer-throw all the Citizens endeuours, and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straightly besieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, whiles the number, strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselues, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe, together with his Wiues, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the City, by a way vnder ground, leauing his amazed and guideless people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremy the Propet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor; vsed now that remedy, which Wolphius truely tearmeth: Triste, turpe & infœlix: Wofull, shamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recouered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Desarts of Iericho: but by reason of the train, that followed him and his, (euery one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soeuer the company was that attended on him, yet, as Iosephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselues into the Desarts as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the Ministers of his vengeance, by whom Zedekias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conueighed to Rebla or Reblath a City (as some thinke) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent betweene Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at one he had to doe. Ioseph. Antiq. l. 10. c. 11.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layed before Zedekias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falshood and periury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that euer he meant should in the World, he caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a skuruish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most maruailous Prophecy of Ezekiel was performed: Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it. Ezek. 12.

This in the eleauenth and last yeare of Zedekias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

3534. In the yeare next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seuenth to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood foure hundred thirty and one yeares.

After this, vpon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with bloud) commanded seuenty and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselues from the first fury, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, fiue of his House-hold seruants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudea; and leauing the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: ouer whom he left Gouernour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his iustice and equity, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a Iew by Nation, left Zedekias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the Warre: and by Ieremies desire to liue with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfe altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his iustice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Ieremy being left to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godolias, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Ieremy, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes, that were left vnder his charge, promising them fauour & liberty, so ſo long as they remained obedient Subiects to Nabuchodonoſor, by whom he was eſtabliſhed Prouinciall Gouernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings houſe (who during the ſiege of Ieruſalem, had kept himſelfe out of the ſtorme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other choſen men, while Godoliah feaſted them in Maſpha or Mitſpa, the City of his reſidence, trayterouſly ſlew him, together with diuers Chaldeans & Iewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an eſcape, and in his way encountring with eighty perſons, repairing towards Godoliah with preſents, he ſlew the moſt of them, and ſpared the reſt, becauſe they promiſed to diſcouer vnto him ſome Treaſures, hidden in the fields during the war. He alſo took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonoſor. This practice and intent of Iſmael had been formerly diſcouered vnto Godoliah by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Iewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Iudea being now left without a Gouernour (for Iſmael durſt not take it vpon him, but retired himſelfe, or rather fled as faſt as he could to the Ammonites) the reſidue of the Iewes, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, reſolued to flye away into Egypt, and beſought Ieremy to aske counſell of God for them: who readily made them anſwer, that if they remained in Iudea, God would prouide for them, and ſhew them mercy; but if they ſought to ſaue themſelues in Egypt, that they ſhould then vndoubtedly periſh. Notwithſtanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and deſpiſing the Oracle of God, and conſtraining Ieremy and Baruch to accompany them, they trauailed into Egypt, and inhabited by the permiſſion of Pharao, neare vnto Taphnes: where when Ieremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the deſtruction of themſelues, and the Egyptians alſo, he was by theſe his owne hard-hearted and vngratefull Countri-men, ſtoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried neare the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of Ierusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time; which in profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, hauing once in Greece by the Olympiads, & in the Easterne Countries by the accompt from Nabonassar, left surer marks, & more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the war of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of Ierusalem to discouer the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those that haue now no state nor policy remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore pursued the story of the World vnto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derined vnto vs, I hold it now conuenient briefly to shew, by what means & circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conioyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry mettals, discouered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did reigne ouer the earth, when Israel was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to insist vpon those authorities, which giue as it were by heare-say, a certaine year of some old Assyrian King vnto some action or euent, wherof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line line in Sardanapalus, if not before; all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus & his issue that occupied the kingdome afterwards, depending vpon the vncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye vpon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony, which some haue found in the years of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserue their names which otherwise might haue beene forgotten. Now concerning the latter Kings of that Nation, howsoeuer it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we onely learne in what age each of them liued, but not in what yeare his reign began or ended, were it not that the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precisely applyed to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence haue we the first light whereby to discouer the meanes of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captiuity of Iuda, which ended when 70. yeares were expired; and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affords vs meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeare of Cyrus his reigne in Persia, by generall consent, is ioyned with the first yeare of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twenty yeares before his Monarchy, and seuen yeares afterwards, it is apparant, and almost out of controuersie. Giuing therefore foure hundred and eight yeares vnto the distance betweene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may easily arriue vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approued faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to set downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuity are markes wherby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeares of the world, through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truely of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, euen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

§. II.

A briefe rehearsall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captiuity: with an answer to the cauils of Porphyrie, inueighing against S. Matthew, and Daniel, vpon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde that the captiuity then began, when Iechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, 11. years before the finall destruction of Ierusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of diuers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captiuity, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these words: In the fiue and twentieth yeere of our being in Captiuitie, in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the foureteenth yeere after that the City was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captiuity in plaine termes, eleuen yeares before the City was destroyed. Berosaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Ioakim, which he endeauours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serue not to make good so much as Berosaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, haue ministred occasion of scoffing & railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not vnderstanding how the sons of King Iosias were called by diuers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captiuity. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious bookes written against the Christians, affirming that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond ſuppoſition of his, Euſebius, Apollonius, and others, haue ſufficiently anſwered. For the ſeuenty Interpreters, who conuerted the old Teſtament about an hundred yeares before Epiphanes, did alſo turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture receiued. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were ſufficient, who liued diuers yeares before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Prieſt ſhewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ieruſalem to haue deſtroyed it, this booke of Daniel, wherein he beheld his owne glory foretold, as the ſame was plainely expounded vnto him; which not onely ſtayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his aſſurance and reſolution was ſo confirmed and ſtrengthened thereby, as deſpiſing all future perill and reſiſtance, he conquered Darius, and the Eaſterne Empire in a ſhorter time than Nabuchodonoſor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Ioſeph.am.11.

It is true indeed that the Iewes themſelues giue leſſe authority to Daniel, than to Moſes, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among thoſe which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they ſay Eſdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But firſt, that the booke of Daniel (I meane ſo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: ſecondly, that it was written by Daniel himſelfe, and not by Eſdras and the Seniors; we may aſſure our ſelues by teſtimony of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Counſell of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty yeares, this booke of Daniel was receiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the ſame Councell it may be ſeene; and ſo doth Meliton the moſt ancient Biſhop of Sardis number it, witneſſe Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſticall hiſtory, the fourth booke, and fiue and twentieth chapter: ſo doth the ſame Author in the Catalogue of Canonicall books vpon Origen: ſo doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Pſalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Meaſures, &c. To theſe I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregory Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be theſe, Daniel, Pſalmes, Prouerbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Eccleſiaſtes, Heſter, Eſra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eſdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement vnto him by his Angell, to ſeale vp the ſame to the time appointed, is an vnanſwerable teſtimony. Yea that which exceedeth all ſtrength of other proofe, our Sauiour Chriſt who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Mark alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the laſt verſe of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of Iohn, Chriſt diſtributeth the riſen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verſe the ſecond. Saint Paul deſcribeth Antichriſt out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels viſions.

§. III.

That the 70. yeeres of captiuity are to be numbred from the deſtruction of Ieruſalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

HAuing thus farre digreſſed, in maintaining that authority, which muſt often be cited in the preſent argument, it is now conuenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of theſe 70. yeares. Neither will I ſtand to trouble my ſelfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakneſſe of that which Euſebius and ſome few nameleſſe Authors, haue ſometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into conſideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers haue ſo earneſtly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Iuda were carried away captiues to Babylon: Firſt, Manaſſes; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel: laſtly, Zedekias, at which time the City and Temple were deſtroyed. To the firſt of theſe captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I haue read; to the ſecond, by few and with weak proofe; to the third, by very many and with much confidence. For beſides thoſe places of Ezekiel already cited, there is a ſtrong argument gathered gathered out of Ieremy, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with Iechonias, vseth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. yeers be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place. Ierem. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremy had already, in the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, denounced the iudgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my seruant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreouer, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the Bridegroome, and the voyce of the Bride, the noyse of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serue the king of Babel 70. yeeres. And when 70. yeeres are expired, I will visit the king of Babel. Ierem. 29. ver. 16. 17. & 18.

Here we see prescribed vnto the captiuity the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophecy was vttered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the City, whereof Ieremy did againe giue notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appeares in the end of the History of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carryed he away to Babel, and they were seruants to him and to his sonnes, vntill the kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Ieremia, vntill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the dayes that she lay desolate, shee kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeeres. But in the first yeare of Cyrus king of Persia (when the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Ieremia, was finished) the Lord stirred vp the spirit of Cyrus. 2. Chron. 36. 19.

We seldome finde one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to haue afterwards been the subiect of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could haue been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophecy haue been more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, vnto this expedition of Ieremia his prophecy, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been promised by prayer, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first yeere of his reigne, I Daniel vnderstood by bookes the number of the yeers, whereof the Lord hath spoken vnto Ieremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. Dan. 9. 2.

So that howsoeuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuity be reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeares of their owne captiuity; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonosor the great captiuity, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of seuenty yeares.

This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authority of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seuenty yeares of the Captiuity, and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they liued, nor the length of their reigns, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honour of his Maiesty, where it may seeme that hee and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardy piece of worke, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by ioyning vnto it the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, diuiding it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders workes: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bowes would carry, but were ready to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Xenoph. Cyropæd lib. 2.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reigne of their seuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath in vaine beene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captiuity of Iuda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, wee may as reasonably forbeare to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children liuing in the Egyptian seruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured summe.

Xenoph. Cyropæd l. 1. & l. 3.

Yet for as much as many haue trauelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. years, not only by the reignes of other Princes, ruling elsse-where, but by the times of the Assyrians themselues: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselues, and in setting downe the years of their seuerall reignes. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither haue they onely the silence of Daniel, who names none other to bee their warrant, but the prophecy of Ieremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his owne will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the king of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, vntill the very time of his Land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serue themselues of him. These words expressing the continuance of the Chaldæan Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vsed herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

Ierem 27. 7.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofes of their different reports are so slender & vnsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliuered in Scriptures, but only set down by some ſome Author of equall credit with the reſt, might very well haue found and deſerued as good beliefe; as any of thoſe things which they haue deliuered in this point. For ſome there are, who following Ioſephus, deriue that Empire, as by deſcent from father to ſon, through fiue generations; beginning with Nabuchodonoſor the great, and giuing to him 43. yeares; to Euilmerodach 18. to Niglisar the ſonne of Euilmerodach 40. to Laboſardach the ſonne of Niglisar 9. Moneths, and laſtly to Balthaſar (whom Ioſephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonoſor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (ſaue that he forbeares to reckon the yeares, and plainly calls Balthaſar the ſonne of Laboſardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Beroſus and Ioſephus as a ſectator of Beroſus, for his Authors; though Beroſus, as he is cited by Ioſephus, report the matter far otherwiſe. For he tells vs that Euilmerodach the ſonne of Nabuchodonoſor did reigne but two yeares, being for his wickedneſſe and luſt, ſlaine by his ſiſters husband Nizigliſſoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him foure yeares, and left it to his owne ſonne Laboſardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine moneths ſlaine by ſuch as were about him, and the kingdome giuen to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conſpirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Ioſephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, haue procured vnto them ſome authority, ſo that the names which they haue inſerted, are taken as it were vpon truſt. There is a third opinion which makes the three laſt kings brethren, and ſonnes of Euilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeue Xenophon, who ſaith that the laſt King of Babylon was immediate ſucceſſour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholaſticall Hiſtory, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that tooke Ieruſalem, and Euilmerodach, another Nabuchodonoſor: plaine enough it is that he hath, out of any Hiſtory ſacred or prophane, as little warrant to guide him, as we haue reaſon to follow him. Euſebius, Sulpitius Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground haue ſuppoſed, that Euilmerodach and Balthaſar were brethren and ſonnes of the great Nabuchodonoſor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthaſar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonoſor his ſonne. And ſo common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Ieremy before cited, proues that Balthaſar was not the ſonne indeed, but the grand childe of that great Conquerour, though by the phraſe very common in Scriptures, and familiar in thoſe Eaſterne languages, he was called the ſon.

Ioſeph. Antiq. lib. 10. cap. 12.

Ioſ. contr. Apian. lib.

Xenoph. Cyropad. lib. 4.

Annius his Metaſthenes hits very rightly the ſeuenty years of captiuity, giuing to Nabuchodonoſor 45. yeares, to Euilmerodach 30. yeares, and to the three ſonnes of Euilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonoſor fourteene years; that is, to Reg-Aſſar the eldeſt ſon three yeares, to Lab-Aſſar Dach the ſecond ſonne ſixe yeares, and to Balthaſar the third ſon fiue.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole ſumme of yeares, and in the number of generations, I haue ſometime ſubſcribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reaſon than becauſe the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not ſatisfie my ſelfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few ſuch of the moderne Writers as deſerue to be regarded, haue conſented with this Metaſthenes; and for that in making Balthaſar ſucceed vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly againſt Xenophon, whoſe Hiſtory of the elder Cyrus in his Aſſyrian warre I cannot ſlightly value in many reſpects, and eſpecially becauſe it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feaſt.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumſtances that might giue any light in this obſcurity, I found manifeſt proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthaſar, by Annius his Metaſthenes, was farre ſhort of the truth, which is enough to render all ſuſpected that he hath ſaid in diſtributing what part of the 70. yeares he pleaſed amongſt the reſt. For in the third yeare of Balthaſar, Daniel ſaw a viſion, after which he was ſicke certaine dayes, but when he roſe vp, he did the Kings buſineſſe: from which buſineſſe, that he did afterwards withdraw himſelfe, and liue retired, ſo long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainly, both by the many words which the old Queene vſed to ſet out his ſufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his preſence, whether he were

Dan. lib. 8. ver. 1. & 27.

62.6.5.v.11. 12.& 13. Dan.2.49. were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares haue been worne out of remembrance, were in my iudgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuity being 70. yeares, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his son and grand-child, must haue reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reignes might fill vp the whole continuance of the captiuity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthasar, ioyned vnto the yeares following the nineteen of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are nothing euen.

Therfore Mercator, and others following him, fashion the yeares of Euilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. yeares giuen to him by Iosephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. yeares, and the two yeares that Berosus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2.) and in the later there should haue bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach regned 28. yeares, whereof fiue together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor liued after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 48; then 4. yeares of Niglisar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his son, and 17. yeares of Labonidus or Balthasar, make vp the number of 70. yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken in all copies extant; vpon how weak a foundation do they build, who hauing nothing to help them, saue onely the bare names of two vnknown Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to haue that place of Ieremy called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reignes of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbeare to rehearse, as falling vnder the same answer. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deseruing to be considered apart from the rest. Hee giues to Nebuchadnezzar 44. years, to Euilmerodach two, to Belsazer fiue: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59. years; beginning (as many do) the captiuity 11. years sooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath been said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein if he haue erred, then is all further inquisition friuolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars reigne, I shall hereafter vpon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we finde in Ieremy, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his reigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion giuen him of the king of Babel, euery day a certaine, all the dayes of his life vntill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) import a farre longer time than two yeares, wherein Iechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did liue, it cannot be proued; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eate bread before this King. Now, that he liued not so short a while after this as 2. yeares, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. years old when he was set at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeares in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. yeares; after which time it seemes plaine that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to haue beene but but a young man; and one of Darius his Pages threescore yeares after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger giues the next fiue yeares, naming him also Laborosardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughters sonne; were it not that herein I find him very careful to helpe out Berosus, by shifting in his Nirgliſſoror, as husband to Nebuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son foure of these yeares; by which meanes there remaines about one yeare to Belſazer alone, agreeing nearely with the nine moneths assigned by Berosus to the sonne of Nigliſar. But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him to passe it ouer with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue iudged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and iudgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the loue of truth) but to shew, that hee himselfe hauing in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approueth, might with greater reason haue wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherin can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that he whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius took the kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of armes: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signifie that Darius tooke or receiued the kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next King entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecy. Neither could it indeed haue properly beene said (if Daniel had cared to vse the most expressiue termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the City, did winne the kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vse. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde only thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia as farre as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine fury, he cried with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come vpon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall auert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slauery vpon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleeue little or nothing, sauing that Nebuchodonosor knew beforehand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the siluer breſt. But that he wanne all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nebuchodonosor wanne both Africke and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moued with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeede that same title of halfe an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it selfe, I easily allow it. But this proues nothing; for meere fictions haue not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one so iudicious, industrious and deepely learned as Ioseph Scaliger, would ouer-shoot himselfe in setting downe repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Argvments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was diuided, and giuen to the Medes and Persians, either we must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthasar lost his life and kingdome, than that his Kingdome was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to haue been Darius, they should be thought to haue done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subiect Prouinces, insomuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yet to Dan. 8. 20. cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to haue beene condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining vpon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus, and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, half so wel as Daniels, whom I beleeue that he vnderstood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Iewes, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Romane world, where they were strangers, and might seeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars, yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the selfe same Ethnicke Philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuertheless in due regard his learning and iudgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then beene very great.

§. VI.

What may bee held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weakenesse, who cannot finde how the 70. years of captiuity are to be diuided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely say with Perrius, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet haue failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subiect to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the iudgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to haue reigned ouer the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when he supposeth by Niglisar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Euilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained,) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to haue occupied the whole time of seuenty years. First therefore let vs consider the reigne of Nabuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yeare Ierusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth laid vtterly desolate.

Most of Writers haue giuen to him 43. yeares of reigne, following therein Berosus. There are who haue added one yeare more; and some haue made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifest

Manifest in is, that the 19. yeare of Nebuchadnezzar, is ioyned with the 11. of Zedekia; as also that his eight yeare, vvas the first yeare of Iechonia his captiuity; the reign of Zedekia occupied all the meane space, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Euilmerodach, it vvas in the seuen and thirtieth yeare of Iechonia his captiuitie; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his 8. yeare (vvhich was the first of Iechonia his bondage) reigned 35. vvhole years, and peradventure a good part of the sixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Iechonia was inlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the year. Substracting therfore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reigne did well neere occupie, those eighteene yeares of his which passed away before the captiuity of Iuda, and ruine of the city, wee haue remaining sixe and twenty yeares of the seuenty, that were almost wholly spent when his son began to reigne.

2. King. 2. 5. 8. & Ier. 51. 12. 2 King. 24. 12. 2 King. 25. 27. & Ier. 52. 31.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seuentie yeares were diuided betweene the Kings ruling in Babylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more iustly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. years, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniecturall; seeing that none who giues any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate coniectures in diuiding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others haue done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoeuer shall discouer my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making me to vnderstand the truth.

Of the foure and forty yeares remaining in accompt of Nebuchadnezzars death, we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuenteene yeare to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Euilmerodach sixe & twentie yeares. Of the yeare belonging vnto Darius the Mede, I haue already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balthasar did reigne seuenteen yeares, we haue the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; Wee haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; and Balthasar to haue been one. But nothing moueth me so much to beleeue this Tradition, as first those euident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeare of Balthasar hee followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeares, passing vnder this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments tooke end either that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, & being alwaies prosperous, could hardly haue occupied any longer time, though we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the middeway. I haue already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reigne of Euilmerodach was not short, and that men of great iudgement haue found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I thinke, they would haue allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus, caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to bee wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therfore condescend vnto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie: How much lesse ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seuen or eight lines, and part euen of the title corrupted, as they beleeue that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus, or of any other that would teach vs; prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus or Iosephus who cited him, hath beene wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe and twenty, as for three and twenty, or perhaps more euen. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5 signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 8 that stands for 2. than hath 9 which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes 85. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other; which how it could bee supposed in 85. standing for 23. I doe not well perceiue. As for the Arithmeticall figures now in vse, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine vnto this businesse, vnlesse wee should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a sort wholly giuen ouer to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serue to make Berosus our friend, so let it bee; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authority, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme to be his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which by peraduenture haue been some cause, that the time it selfe was, and is yet sought to be abridged, as not hauing left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people euen their being. For any Nation (I know not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could haue desired, betooke themselues to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sons of greedy fathers, their own wisedome greater, which knew how to enioy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the restlesse trauell of purchasing. Though indeed the reigne of Nabuchodonosor was so diuided, that his youthfull and stronger yeares hauing been exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth yeare of his reigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mighty Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, hee, vntill his three and twentieth yeare, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and setued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Iland, safe enough from any danger of a Land-armie, and whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemie at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ierusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemie) it appeares by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voyce of Tyrus: Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned vnto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length euen in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great worke of his, whereof we haue already spoken, began to appeare aboue the waters, and threaten them with inuitable mischiefe.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay which appoint vnto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. years, doe not seeme to be restrained to the reign of the Chaldeans, nor plainly plainely ſhew, that ſhe followed Ieruſalem, the ſame nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonoſor, in the ſame, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtleſſe were memorable in the iſſue of ſo great and laborious a ſiege, are in a manner vtterly loſt. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Town vnable to hold out, embarked themſelues, and fledde into the Iſle of Cyprus. Neuertheleſſe it ſeemes that this euaſion ſerued only the principall men, who eſcaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer ſort vnto the enemies furie. For, not onely ſuch people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the ſword; but the like execution was done in the ſtreets, into which, with exceſſiue labour, the Aſſyrian made way for his Horſes and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonoſor cauſed his Armie to ſerue a great ſeruice againſt Tyrus, wherein euery head was made bald, and euery ſhoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to reſt contented with the Honour of hauing deſtroyed that Citie, which in all mens iudgements had beene held inuincible. Ezech. 29. 18.

The deſtruction of theſe two great and powerfull Cities, hauing made the name of the Chaldæans dreadfull in the eares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonoſor vſed the aduantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with leſſe paine. The Kingdome of Egypt vvas the marke at which he aimed; a Country ſo abounding in all riches and pleaſures, that it might well haue tempted any Prince, finding himſelfe ſtrong enough to ſeek occaſion of quarrell againſt it; and ſo farre an enemie to the Crown of Babylon, that had it bin poore, yet either it muſt haue beene ſubdued, or the conqueſt of Syria could ill haue been eſtabliſhed. Neuertheleſſe it was needfull, that before hee entred into this buſineſſe, the Countries adiacent ſhould be reduced into ſuch termes, that either they ſhould wholly ſtand at his deuotion, or at leaſt be vnable to worke him any diſpleaſure: And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all proſperous enterpriſes, with reaſon of ſtate. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damaſcus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their ſinnes had condemned to fall vnder the Babylonian ſwords, were ſuch, as regarding only their owne gaine, had ſome of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldæan Armie, to feed vpon the karcaſſes that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking aduantage of their neighbours miſeries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonoſor: all of them thinking, that when the Aſſyrian had ſatisfied his fury, he ſhould be faine to forſake thoſe deſolate parts, and leaue the poſſeſſion to thoſe that could lay hand vpon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philiſtims had ſhewed much malice to the Iewes when their City was taken. What good ſeruice they had done to the Chaldæans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to haue been with reference to their owne purpoſes, wherein they were diſappointed. The Ammonites were not contended to reioyce at the fall of Ieruſalem, but preſently they entered vpon the Country of Gad, and took poſſeſſion, as if not the Aſſyrians, but they, had ſubdued Iſrael. Neither can I perceiue what other ground that practice had of Baalis king of the Ammonites, when he ſent Iſmael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour ouer thoſe that remained in Iſrael, and to carry captiue into the Ammonites Country the people that abode in Mizpah, than a deſire of embroiling Nabuchodonozor with ſo many labours at once, as ſhould make him retire into his owne Countrey, and abandon thoſe waſted Lands to himſelfe and others, for whom they lay conueniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exerciſe; whoſe pride and wrath were made fruſtrate by God, & their diſſimulation condemned, as not doing right. Ezech. 25. 12. & 15. Ezech. 25. 3. Ier. 49. 1. Ier. 40. 14. & 41. 2. & 10. Ier. 28. 27. & 6.

All theſe Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to ſuch as liue or border vpoon deſarts; and now the time afforded them occaſion to ſhew the vttermoſt cunning of their theeuiſh wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut aſunder all their deuices by ſharpe and ſuddaine warre, ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Eſay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatneſſe and ſwiftneſſe of the miſerie that ſhould come vpon them. With which of them he firſt began, I finde not; it ſeemes that Moab was the laſt which felt his hand: for ſo doe many good Authors interpret the propheſie of Eſay, threatning Moab with deſtruction after three yeares, as hauing reference to the third yeare following the ruine of Ieruſalem; the next year after it being ſpent in the Egyptian Eſay 16. 14.

expedition. This is manifeſt, that all the principal Townes in theſe Regions were burnt, and the people ſlaine, or made ſlaues, few excepted, who being preſerued by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-haſtily, much leſſe to attempt any thing againſt Nabuchodonoſor, but liued as miſerable out-lawes, or at leaſt oppreſſed wretches, vntill the end of the ſeuenty yeares, which God had preſcribed vnto the deſolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

§. V III.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning ſlaine by Nabuchodonoſor, contrarie to the opinion of moſt Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwiſe.

WHen by a long courſe of victory Nabuchodonoſor had brought into ſubiection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in ſuch wiſe, that no enemy to himſelfe, nor friend of the Egyptian, was left at his backe, that might giue impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conqueſt of Egypt himſelfe, vpon which thoſe other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious iſſue thereof, the three great Prophets, Eſay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, haue written ſo plainely, that I hold it altogether needleſſe to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of theſe. Neuertheleſſe, wee finde many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to ſtraine theſe Prophecies with vnreaſonable diligence vnto ſuch a ſenſe, as giues to Nabuchodonoſor little more than the honour of hauing done ſome ſpoyle in Egypt, omitting the conqueſt of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with theſe times or affaires. So prepoſterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and ſecond helpes conducing to their purpoſe, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Authour; and to vphold a ſentence, giuing teſtimony to one clauſe, doe careleſly ouerthrow the hiſtorie it ſelfe, which thereby they ſought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about theſe times, are already reheaſed in the former booke: but that vvhich they haue ſpoken of Apries, was purpoſely reſerued vnto this place. Herodotus doth affirme that he was a very fortunate King, but wherin he telleth not; (vnleſſe we ſhould vnderſtand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is ſaid to haue made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned fiue and twenty yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne Subiects; who did ſet vp Amaſis, as King, which preuailed againſt him. The rebellion of the Egyptians he imputeth to a great loſſe which they receiued in an expedition againſt the Cyrenians, by whom almoſt their whole Army was deſtroyed. This calamitie the people of Egypt thought to be well pleaſing to their King, who had ſent them on their dangerous expedition, with a purpoſe to haue them conſumed, that ſo he might with greater ſecuritie reigne ouer ſuch as ſtaied at home. So they who eſcaped, and the friends of ſuch as were ſlaine, rebelled againſt Apries, vvho ſent Amaſis to appeaſe the tumult; but Amaſis became Captain of the rebels, and was by them choſen King. Finally, the whole Land conſented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driuen to truſt vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readineſſe thirty thouſand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquiſhed by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thouſand, which were all by birth and education men of Warre. Apries himſelfe being taken priſoner, was gently intreated by Amaſis for a while, vntill the Egyptians, exclaiming vpon him, as an extreame enemie to the Land, got him deliuered into their hands, and ſtrangled him, yet they gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerely agree, telling vs that Apries did vanquiſh the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demoliſhed Sidon, wanne the other townes of Phœnicia, and the Iſle of Cyprus, and finally, periſhed as is before rehearſed, when he had had reigned two and twenty yeares. This authority were enough (were there none) to informe vs of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than haue the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that looke onely into humane reasons. For Esay prophecied long before of the shamefull captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Assur should carry away naked, young & old, in such wise, that the Iewes, who fled vnto them for deliverance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves. Esa.20 ver.4.5. & 6.

But Ezekiel & Jeremy as their prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel doth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre. Also hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and goe into captivity, yea, that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slaine by the sword. Wherefore it must needes be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed vnto Apries, by force indeed, but by the vniforme consent of all the people. Certainely, in that notable place of Jeremy, wherein hee foretelleth how the Iewes in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had before, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it; then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a brick-kill, those very stones, vpon which the Throne of Nebuchadonosor should bee set, and his Pauilion spred. Yea then was that prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, and Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods and their kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their liues, and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his seruants. The clearenesse of this prophecy being such, as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder, what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherfore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to bee Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned vpon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well bee thought, that the history of Nebuchadnezzar was better knowne to the Iewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleeue Iosephus, reporting that Nabuchadonosor in the three and twentieth yeare of his reigne, and the fift yeare of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who being meere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all aduantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Iosephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might be verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinkes the death of Apries can no way be approued as having beene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition, yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great loue & honor which the Egyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimony of all others that haue handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can we thinke it probable, that Apries hauing wonne great victories, did for one onely losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Egypt would seeke, or so diuocate himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subiects. As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Zaiglon the prisoner, is said to haue kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainer, and one that armed himselfe against the Egyptians, willing them feeble and weake, rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to recall Arguments that might be alledged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to haue kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forraine Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would haue desired to saue his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disproue that opinion, whereunto I should not haue yeelded, though it had stood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it, but leaue the circumstances, proouing the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to bee obserued, where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall History of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should haue preserued the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth vp in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Warres are in a manner vterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall finde, who will take the paines to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular obseruation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe most safe in Egypt by the well defenced situation of his Country, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldæan Army, so the confidence and vaine security of the Egyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian desarts, and the much aduantage which the great riuer of Nilus would afford vnto themselues, did little auaile them in prouision for the war, and much astonish them (as may iustly be thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand fiue hundred and fourescore yeares; but from this time forward it remained forty yeares without a King, vnder the subiection of the Babylonians, & then at length it began to recouer by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was neuer dreadfull vnto others, God hauing said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath beene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wise, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The Riuer is mine, and I haue made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fooles, the Riuer failed them, the King himselfe was taken & slaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee slew the King then reigning, placed another in his roome, and carried captiues thence to Babylon, the Iewes whom hee found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Iosephus giues vnto this businesse, and the businesse it selfe, I haue already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeare of Nebuchadnezzar, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to haue been at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tels vs, that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, we must vnderstand, that he was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some haue mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alledged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconuenience, imagine that there were two successiuely bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life & kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceiue, that Apries, of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharao Necho, & made war (as they report) vpon the Phœnicians, who were before the Egyptians, become subiect vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of Egypt, was more likely to haue had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; vnlesse wee should thinke, that he had beene a traytor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conqueror with Lieutenantship of the Countrey: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Nebuchadonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may guesse; that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authority of Iosephus; that his Gouernour (or some Successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vse their liberty, and beleeue what they list. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to haue kept of Ionians & Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Prouinces: likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Historians, deposed & slew Apries, I take them to haue been the Egyptian fugitiues, which then recouered their own Country. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty yeares will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captiuity of Egypt, and will cause them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keepe the Greeks from knowledge of their Counties disgrace; then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them. Ezek. 30. v. 13. & 14.

Of the sundry accounts drawne from sundry acts of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Nineue, by him; the time of which action is vncertaine.

THese victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars reigne in sundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might seeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captiue in the third yeare of Ioachims reigne (which ran along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars first yeare) & was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence, it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzars Kingdome, wherein hee interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, foreshewing the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of diuers places which referre sundry matters vnto their set years, as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Egypt should be giuen in reward for the seruice done before Tyrus, dating his prophecy in the seuen and twentieth yeare, and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeare; for these yeares held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Dan. 1. & 2.

Nebuchad-

Nebuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captiuities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine search.

Of any warre made by Nebuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not reade: excepting that against Nineue, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Naum. Nineue had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subiect to Babylon. Yet was it left vnder a peculiar king, who rebelling against the Chaldæan, as Iehoiakim and Zedechias tributary kings of Iuda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineue followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinkes) vnpossible to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzars reign, the place of Nahum last cited, is enough to disproue it. Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian warres; the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went betweene the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very yeare of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchonodosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiosity of Tyberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would seek to learne what woman that Hulzab Queen of Nineue was, whose wofull captiuity the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the later time of Nebuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no Monuments extant; saue those which we finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I haue built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiesty? Surely if those things bee true that are by Iosephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to haue beene reared, and finished in fifteene dayes.

Dan. 4. 27.

But of all this, & other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vndeseruedly fell these iudgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not onely with many victories, & much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouery of things to come after him, yea and had approued the certainty of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neuertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Vrlox oblivio veritatis, vt qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuam sibi fieri iubeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur: A hastie forgetfulnesse of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the seruant of God, as if hee had beene God himselfe; should now commaund a statue to bee erected vnto himselfe, wherein himselfe might bee worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuery of those blessed Saints out of the fierie furnace; who being throwne into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted assisted by an Angell; preserued from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this deuotion of Nebuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hastie zeale. Therfore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible iudgement hanging ouer his head which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his errour. Hereby it seemes that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatned, but this threatning sufficed not vnto his information. For, that so great a Monarch should be driuen from among men; (according to the tenor of the dream & interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eate grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans iudgement, that easily it might bee thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole yeares leasure to repent was giuen to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to haue bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue monethes, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so ouer-ioyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heauie iudgement pronounced against him, he vttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiesticall workes which he had reared, as well beseeming his maiesticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heauen, telling him that his kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, haue taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haue read of any, that were punished for reioycing in workes of this kinde (though it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a iust measure) excepting onely this Nebuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings haue mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue been knowne to haue beene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things wherewith God hath blessed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulnesse to entertain them with a sullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it vnto the brightnesse of eternall felicitie; so that insolent ioy, which man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his own worth, doth aboue all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightning, & make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these malamentis gaudia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than sorrowes, cares, and feares: not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainely it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when these vnreasonable flushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should haue been humbled with a iust repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deseruing.

This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seuen yeares hee liued, not only as a saluage man, but as a saluage beast, for a beast he thought himselfe, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that hee was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, in so much as hee appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) speakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was hee changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Ieromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my vnderstanding restored vnto me, &c. Quando dixit (saith S. Ierome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; When he saith that his sense was restored vnto him, hee shewed that hee had not lost his humane shape, but

§. XII.
Of Euilmerodach.

HAuing already ſpoken what I could of the ſucceſſion and yeares of Nebuchadnezzars poſterity; the moſt that may be ſaid of him, is ſaid of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearſe.

He loſt ſome part of that which his father had gotten; and left his kingdome burning in a warre that conſumed it to aſhes. Hee loſt Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his reign, which was fortie yeares after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amaſis foure and forty yeares of reigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who giues him fiue and fifty, ſaying, that he died in the third yeare of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, when Cambyſes did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but ſeuen and thirty yeares, which paſſed between the ſecond yeare of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the firſt of Amaſis) and the fift of Cambyſes his reigne, wherein he wan Egypt; of which ſeuen and thirty yeares it is credibly held, that Pſamennitus, the ſon of Amaſis, reigned three: ſo that Amaſis could bee no longer king than foure and thirtie yeares. But ſeeing that theſe two Greek Hiſtorians haue bin abuſed by Egyptian Prieſts, in the ſubſtance of that which was ſpoken of Amaſis, it is no maruell though they were alſo deceiued in the length of his reigne. This is the plaine anſwer to this obiection. For to ſay either that the numbers were miſ-written, & foure & forty ſet down in ſtead of foure and thirtie, or that Amaſis did temporize a while with the Aſſyrians, and not beare himſelfe as abſolute king of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proued out of Ezekiel, that Egypt became againe a kingdome) I hold it a ſuperfluous excuſe.

Whether theſe Egyptian troubles did animate the king of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in preſent forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) ſome foyle receiued by the Aſſyrian inuading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebel againſt him: I will neither vndertake, nor ſeek to define. Xenophon tels, that the firſt ſeruice of yong Cyrus in warre, was vnder Aſtyages king of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a proſperous fight againſt the Aſſyrian Prince, who did ſet vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteene or ſixteene yeares old. If therefore Cyrus liued threeſcore and three yeares (as he is ſaid to haue died well ſtricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinary tearm of no ſhort life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Euilmerodach his reigne. Yet by the ſame reckoning it ſhould follow, that the warre began more early between theſe Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumſtances inſinuating as much, are found in the ſame place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or deſtruction of Nabuchodonoſor gaue courage vnto thoſe that had felt him a troubleſome neighbour, to ſtand vpon prouder tearmes with the Aſſyrians, than in his flouriſhing eſtate they durſt haue vſed. Howſoeuer the quarrell beganne, we find that it ended not before the laſt ruine of the Aſſyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digeſt the loſſes which he receiued by the Medes and their Allies the Perſians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the leſſer Aſia, with gifts and ſtrong perſwaſions, hoping ſo to ouer-whelme his enemies with a ſtrong inuaſion, vvhom in vaine hee had ſought to wearie out with a lingring Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, who left the world in the nineteenth yeare of Euilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian hauing his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, feemes thereby to haue giuen the better meanes vnto the Egyptians, of new erecting their kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebell against ages, and set vp a King within it selfe, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach, against the Medes, was such as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeares before vttered against Babel, by Esay and Ieremie.

For, the Assyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Medes and Persians vnder their thicke showres of arrowes & darts, were encountred with an army of stout and well trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Euilmerodach was slaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and vp-held, being shaken and grieuously cracked vnder his vnfortunate Son, was left to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

Against the coniecture of the Author; seeming to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Euilmerodach, without wrong to the Truth. The iustice, and death of Balthasar.

Though I haue already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proued that Balthasar was not the Son, and immediate Successour to Euilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Nigliſar, or Niglisaroor, and his son Labassardach betweene them: as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some errour might haue crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might haue found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I obserue, that the time which Berosus diuides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nebuchadnezzar liued wilde among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddennesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitie pitied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason iudge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setling the gouernment, whilest the King was thus distracted, wee shall finde it most likely, that his Son and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach beeing to supply the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors do the vnripenes of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and vsefull workes about the Riuer of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Nineue. Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leaue it vnto her vngracious son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could haue reigned, wee doe not finde; but we finde in Berosus (as Iosephus hath cited him) that Nigliſar, who got the Kingdome from Euilmerodach, was his sisters husband; husband; which argues this to haue been the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine moneths reigne he were for his lewd conditions slaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Beroſus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose terme of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vse many words to confute that which Beroſus hath further set down of Euilmerodach, telling vs that he was slaine by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, named the yeare wherin he gaue liberty to Iecouia, doe plainly testifie that he out-liued the three or foure and fortieth yeare of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to haue succeeded Euilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeed haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthaſar, who was his Son and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruine of the people. Hee was from his young yeares of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should haue married his sister, only for spight and enuy to see him kill two wilde beasts in hunting, at which himselfe hauing thrown his laueline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman cõmending his beauty, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as soone as hee was King. Neither doe I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a foole hee lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to giue battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him. Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with a dreadfull vision; which had shewed his ruine not in many houres before, euen whilest he was drinking in that vvine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reigne of seuenteene yeares, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as hee deserued. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story that of Balthaſar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthaſar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was ioyned first to that of Media, which then was gouerned by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it selfe.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were tenne Kings besides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouernours hauing cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, diuided betweene them the Easterne Empire. Cyaxares (vvhom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus vvas ended in Balthaſar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third sonne of Iapher; that they had Kings soone after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus haue found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seauen sonnes, slaine by the Assyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I haue spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

Darius Medus.

And though the Greeks ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs, that Darius was not only king of Media, & had the Persians his followers, but that the Army victorious ouer Balthazar was his, as the Assyrian & Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For we finde in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threescore & two years old: And further, what Officers pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it propheciedby Isay long before; Behold, I will stirre vp the Medes against them, &c. And by Ieremy; The Lord hath raised vp the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight & twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, & others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subiugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians & Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Iustine and Herodotus are not to be receiued, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone. (a. 13. v. 17. 51. v. 11. & 28. Lib 16.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOw the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings haue bred the former opinion of those who giue the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astigas or Aparnas) but only that hauing vanquished him in battaile, & confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited and seldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very iustly reproued of wilfull vntruth.

Viginier a diligent & learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successor. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Affricanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hieronie, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath giuen other Son or Successour to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negatiue, doth neuer inforce consent, we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme, that either Astyages himselfe must haue beene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time, Or else to giue him some other Successour, according to Iosephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Army, and subiect to his authority; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being ioyned together to compound it.

Ezr. l. 1. c. 19.
Ios. an. l. 10. c. 13.
Xen. l. 8. Ped.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victory ouer Babylon was wholly giuen to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe for this action, but for the deliuery of his Church; a greater worke not only in the eies of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchy, how powerfull soeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that seruice did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posterity, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among profane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, & did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of what soeuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried farre off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his prophecie, makes it plaine, that himselfe not onely liued a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus, which being the year of Daniels death, could not haue bin distinguished from the reigne of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned ioyntly; Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynt forces with the Assyrians, and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our vnderstanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, & was become Lord of all Syria, & many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought vnder his subiection, there should not then be left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being ioined, made an exceeding strong Army.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Croesus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse, to his assistance, alleaging, that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conioyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Army of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse, of which, tenne thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were leadde by Croesus, who had great cause of enmity with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Army was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slaine, so many of the Assyrians reuolted, as Babylon in selfe could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his aduantage, possest himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræsus himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Army lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters son, preuailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as vsed the Dart or Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Horoicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulke and grosse of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historicall truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like Writers, that in euery speech & circumstance he hath precisely tyed himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own inuention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politick discourse, and examining but the History of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his vnder-taken subiect in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

FOr it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perses being Gouernour of Persia, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conueyed ouer the same honour & power to their posterity; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill such time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authority and maiesty of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reigne of Deioces, are vsually accounted about an hundred and forty yeares, in the last sixty wherof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Successours; whose great atchieuements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vndertake any offensiue warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet between these the successours of Belothus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astyages, there past aboue ninetie yeares, in which if Herodotus haue written truely, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had beene but an vnaduised enterprise of the Assyrians & Babylonians, to haue wasted themselues against the Syrians and Egyptians, leauing so able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselues were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan, the chiefe City thereof. It is true indeede, that the Medians, either vnder Cyaxares or Astyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Cræsus, which after some sixe yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I do not finde any memory. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then possest, with the confederacy which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more security than fame: For if their Kings, being the posterity of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not haue suffered any forgetfulnesse thereof. But as we finde all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very consonant & agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achamenes held the Principality of Persia from Father to Sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better giue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyses the father of Cyrus was King of Persia; than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Astyages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her son (whose natiuity hee feared) might be disabled from any great vndertaking by his fathers ignobility.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astyages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that vpon such a Prophecie his loue to his grand-childe should haue encreased, and his care been the greater to haue married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Authour, and as I thinke the deuiser of the mischiefe intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achæmenidæ was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperity did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which hee would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, or had they beene the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seuenth of Herodotus deriueth himselfe.

Cambyses.	Ariaramnes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arsamnes.	Xerxes.

Of the Achæmenidæ there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male failed in his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis. This royall family is thus set down by the learned Reineccius.

Achæmenes, the sonne of Perses, first King of Persia.
Darius.
Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyses and Atossa; who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artystona and other daughters.
Cambyses had Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had Cambyses, who succeeded him, and Smerdis slaine by his brother Cambyses.

Of the second were those seuen great Princes of Persia, who hauing ouerthrowne the vsurped royalty of the Magi, chose from among themselues Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first known by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the sonne of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamitæ; by Elianus, Elymæ; by Iosephus, Elymi.

Euſl.l.6.c.8.de Prep.Euang. Suidas deriues this Nation sometimes from Assur, sometime from Magog, of whom they were called Magusæi; which Magusæi, according to Eusebius, are not to bee taken for the Nation in generall, but for those who were afterward called the Magi or Wise men. So do the Greeks, among many other their sayings of them, affirme, That the Persians were anciently written Artæi, & that they called themselues Cephenes. But that they were Elamitæ, Moses and the Prophets, Esay, Ieremy, Ezechiel, Daniel and Esdras in many places confirme: Which also S. Hierome vpon Ieremy the fiue and twentieth, vpon Daniel the eight, and also in his Hebrew questions, approueth, saying: Elam à quo Elamitæ Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that City which the Author of the second booke of the Maccabees calleth Persepolis, is by the Anthor of the first called Elimais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vaine, and to his great dishonour. And yet this City, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who liued with Amraphel or Ninias, and ioyned with him in the war against those Arabians; who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and first actions.

AS touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a riuer which watereth Persia; this great Prince hauing Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name, Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people. Strab. Lib. 15.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sunne, in the same Language. Howsoeuer it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred yeares before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus saith the Lord vnto Cyrus his Annointed, &c. Plut. in vit. Artax.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, & other Prouinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Crœsus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchiuements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded vpon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in the last warre against Crœsus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight & fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might haue bin vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honor of hauing won Babylon it selfe, which in due place I haue answered. The latter seems to haue reference to the second War which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations neuer offered to reuolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeue with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Crœsus the King of Lydia, who made warre vpon Cyrus.

I Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Crœsus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the sonne of Atys: Which Family extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twenty generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his faire Wife naked to Gyges his Fauorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day slaine. Which done, Gyges enioyed both the Queen and the Kingdome of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his son, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) & Halyattes begat Crœsus: Which fiue Kings, of a third race, enioyed that kingdome an hundred and seauenty years. Halyattes the father of Crœsus was an vndertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it sixe years: a peace was concluded vpon equall conditions between them. Herodot. l. 1.

Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Crœsus sister, whom he married.

But Cræsus so farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King of Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had ioyned Phœnicia, Palæstina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his owne life.

But Cræsus, notwithstanding the men & treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastred Æolis, Doris, & Ionia, Prouinces possest by the Greekes in Asia the lesse, adioyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, & other Nations. And that he also inforc'd the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their city with Diana's girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreouer, Athenæus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victory which Cræsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen yeares.

Athen. l. 14. c. 17.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and enuious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous vndertakings might in the end grow preiudicious to himselfe, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with sumptuous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, & the vnderstood, from whom he receiued this riddle; Crœsus passing ouer the River Halys, shall dissolue a great Dominion. For the diuell being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with meet ambidize of both sides like, and might be inuerted either way to the ruine of Persia, or of his owne Lydia.

§. III.

Crœsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEreupon Cræsus being resolued to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren & mountainous Region, a people not couered with the soft silke of wormes, but with the hard skins of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, hee could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, & subiected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceiued.

Notwithstanding this solid counsaile, Cræsus hauing prepared a powerfull army, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a city of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all means to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, & found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I do not find: for out of doubt, Cræsus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and ability; so was he not vnder any in territory and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane liberty, That Kingdomes & Commonweales had their encrease and period from diuine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Cræsus prosperity at hand, the leaues of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had giuen a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of diuers skirmishes, the Persians & Lydians began to ioyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduancement of either Nations: & as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each Army from the others view, Cræsus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recouered Sardis his first City and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arriued, and nothing suspecting suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of fiue moneths, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

CYrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Army in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discouered. But hauing good intelligence of Cræsus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Cræsus had disposed his Army to their Wintring garrisons: which being altogether vnlooked for, & vnfeared, hee surrounded Sardis with his Army: Wherein Cræsus hauing no other Companies than his Citizens & ordinary Guards, after fourteen dayes siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cræsus hauing now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vndergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremity of passion and feare enabled) cried out to the souldiers to spare Cræsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoiled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the discourse which hee had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that inuocation, he first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told him, That many men in the race and courses of their liues might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discerne himselfe for happy indeed, till his end.

In communi calamitate suam quisque habet fortunam. [Curt.

Homo qui in homine calamitoso misericors est, meminit sui. Cass.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune and his owne mortality, he commanded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to saue Cræsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what selfe reason had condnced him to inuade his territory, & to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous, and my vnprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inuenters and conductors of Cræsus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierc't with Cræsus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a king and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behauiour which we call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniustly: A King that giueth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Cræsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuers, and is here already set down, that hee should haue beene burnt aliue. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroycall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to bee forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neerenesse of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had hee beene otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoeuer it was, the Morall part of the Story hath giuen much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Cræsus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vse him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his Army ouer Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræsus to accompany and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he liued all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow

Cambyses

Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians & Lydians; in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Crœsus.

§. V.

How Cyrus wonne Babylon.

AFter this Lydian War ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was iustly reputed the greatest Monarch then liuing vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it seemes, that ten whole yeares did passe betweene his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which neuertheless I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Assyrian warre, but rather to haue bin spent in setling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus vpon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Crœsus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus inuaded Scythia, and being victorious ouer that Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battell ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was deliuered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious army, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crœsus, and now by Cyrus, reuolted from him; against whom he imployed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians vnder their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, & Lycians, who resoluedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselues. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, hauing taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to diuert him, or to raise that siege, & make frustrate the work vpon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care & strength vnto the taking of that City, which beside the fame & reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, & surrounded with waters vnfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The onely hope of the Medes & Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a City so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessaries; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twenty years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soone appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trauell, and all in vaine, if they did not keep streight watch and strong guards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those walls which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their commander: The consideration whereof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who hauing bin their ancient friends & allies, were more likely to ioyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of seruitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselues in this deceitfull and vaine gladnesse, that is the ordinary fore-runner of suddaine calamity; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentiue, deuised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, and so to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, he he ſtayed the time of his aduantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vn-cut, betweene the maine riuer which ſurrounded the City, and his owne Trenches.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weaknes within, nor any poſſibility of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publike Plaies and other Paſtimes, and thereto inuited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobility, beſides his wiues, curtizans, & others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his prouiſions were either ſufficient, not onely for all needefull vſes, but euen for iollity and exceſſe: Or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken; or in honour of Bel his moſt reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all theſe reſpects. And hee was not contented with ſuch magnificence as no Prince elſe could equall, but (vſing Daniels words) He lifted himſelfe vp againſt the Lord of Heauen: For he & his Princes, wiues & concubines, made carowſing cups of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praiſed his owne puppets, made of Siluer & Gold, of Braſſe, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit ſtultitia in vaſibus aureis bibentes, ligneos & lapideos deos laudare; How great a fooliſhneſſe was it (ſaith S. Hierome,) drinking in golden Cups, to praiſe gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthaſar was in this ſort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by diuine power wrote on the wall oppoſite vnto him, certaine words which he vnderſtood not: wherewith ſo great a feare and amazement ſeized him, as the ioynts of his loynes were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion when he had in ſome part recouered, he cried out for his Caldæans, Aſtrologians, & Southſayers, promiſing them great rewards, & the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the writing; but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment the Queen hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done, vſed this ſpeech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and vnderſtanding, and wiſdome, like the wiſedome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonoſor thy father; the King (I ſay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Aſtrologians, Chaldæans, and Southſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and vnderſtanding, &c. were found in him, euen in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation. Dan. 5. 6.

This Queene, Ioſephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthaſar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings wiues, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banquetting, ſhe came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, & to comfort the King in his diſtraction: And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembred well what hee had done in the daies of Nabuchodonoſor, grandfather to this Balthaſar, and kept in minde both his religion and diuine gifts. Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Ioſeph. Anti. 10.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to reade and interpret thoſe words miraculouſly written; to whom Daniel made anſwer in a farre different ſtyle from that hee vſed towards his Grandfather: for the euill which he foretold Nabuchodonoſor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies; but to this King (whoſe neglect of God and vice he hated) he anſwered in theſe words, Keepe thy rewards to thy ſelfe, and giue thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing vnto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him firſt the cauſe of Gods iuſt iudgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence, whereof the King and all his Wiſe men were vtterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodneſſe to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefits, as he depriued him of his eſtate and vnderſtanding; ſo vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King notwithſtanding lifted himſelfe vp againſt the ſame God, and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe veſſels dedicated to holy vſes, and neglecting the Lord of all power; praiſed and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Braſſe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Vpharſin, Dan. 5. v. 18. 19. 20.

gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, & finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods iustice, and found too light; and that his Empire was diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians.

The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunity to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobility were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the feare of Gods iudgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them hee drew the great Riuer of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channell running, his Army made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleepe and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saued themselues by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had reuolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselues to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected company to the Kings Palace; which hauing easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, slew both him and them without any mercy, who strugled in vaine to keepe those liues which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecy of Ieremy fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred yeares before this subuersion, who in his seuen and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and liuely, as if he had beene present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamity of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of euery suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His propheſie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daughter of the Chaldæans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vsed Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldæans, to punish the idolatry of the Iudæans, yet Esay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his iudgements was mixt with a rigorous extremity. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I haue polluted mine inheritance, and giuen them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heauy yoake vpon the ancient. I will rise vp against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Euery one that is found, shall be striken thorow: and whosoeuer ioyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eies, their houses spoyled, and their wiues rauished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that receiued the report from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the same to posterity after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his propheſies, which were written two hundred yeares before any thing attempted.

Ier. 27. Esa. 47. Cap. 47. Isai. 14. To wit Euilmerodach and Balthasar.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by diuers graue Authors set downe, might seeme altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politikes, the second Chapter, receiued the report for true, That one part of the City knew not that the rest was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimony of Diodorus Siculus may bee taken; who findes the compasse thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fiue and forty miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that fiue chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitrachus, three hundred threescore and fiue foot, garnished with an hundred and fifty Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Booke of Geography giues it a greater circuit, adding fiue and twenty furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fiue furlongs, which makes eight and forty mile and one furlong; but finds the wall farre vnder that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thickenesse but at two and thirty foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; euery cubit containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the City he giues the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred

dred and foureſcore furlongs circle; the thickneſſe of the wall he meaſures at fifty cubits, and the height at two hundred of the ſame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braſſe, with poſts and hookes to hang them on of the ſame mettall: and therfore did the Prophet Eſay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeſſe & Glory of Kingdomes. Her. l. 1. Eſ. 47. & 13.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he ſtript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a ſlaue, diuiding not onely all her goodly houſes, and her whole Territory, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers, but beſtowing the inhabitants themſelues as bond-ſlaues vpon thoſe that had taken poſſeſſion of their goods.

Touching the reigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in reſt and pleaſure, I can ſay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue laſted only ſeuen yeares: in which time he made ſuch Conſtitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wiſe Kings that are deſirous to eſtabliſh a Royall power to themſelues and their poſterity.

§. VI.
The end of Cyrus.

THe laſt warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diuerſly written. Herodotus and Iuſtine deliuer, That after the Conqueſt of Aſia the leſſe, Cyrus inuaded the Maſſagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene: and that in an incounter between the Perſians and theſe Northerne Nomades, Tomyris loſt her Army, and her Son Spargapiſes that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of Warre, and following the Warre againſt Cyrus, in a ſecond battaile beat the Perſian Army, and taking Cyrus priſoner, cut off his head from his body, and caſt the ſame into a boule of bloud, vſing theſe words; Thou that haſt all thy life time thirſted for bloud, now drinke thy fill; and ſatiate thy ſelfe.

It ſhould heereby ſeeme, that Cyrus knowing the ſtrength and multitude of thoſe frozen Nations, was perſwaded to abate their fury by ſome forcible inuaſion and depopulation, becauſe in the time of Cyaxares, father to Aſtyages, thoſe Scythians inuaded Media and Aſia the leſſe, and held the ſame in a ſeruile ſubiection eight and twenty yeares.

This warre which Metaſthenes calleth Tomyrique, laſted (ſaith he) ſixe yeares, and took end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Vigiuer, that this Scythian Warre was rather the ſame which Cyrus made againſt the Sacians, before the conqueſt of Lydia, according to Cteſias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the ſucceſſe of that warre otherwiſe than Herodotus doth: The rather (ſaith Vigiuer) becauſe Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, that Cyrus ſurprized the Sacians by the ſame ſtratageme by which Iuſtine ſaith, he defeated the ſonne of Tomyris. And the ſame Cteſias alſo reporteth, That the laſt warre which Cyrus made was againſt Amorrhaus king of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the reſt) of Scythia, whom though he ouercame, yet he then receiued the wound of his death, which he ſuffered three daies after. Vig. in Cteſ. Bib. Cteſ. l. 15. Bib. Strab. l. 15.

Strabo alſo affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne City of Paſagardes, which himſelfe had built, & where his Epitaph was to be read in his time, which is ſaid to haue been this: O vir quicunque es, & vndecunque aduenis, neque enim te aduenturum ignoraui: Ego ſum Cyrus qui Perſis imperium conſtitui, pauſillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas. O thou man, whoſoeuer thou art, or whencesoeuer thou commeſt; for I was not ignorant that thou ſhouldeſt come: I am Cyrus that founded the Perſian Empire, doe not enuy vnto me this little earth, with which my body is couered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon hope of treaſure ſuppoſed to haue been buried with him, or vpon deſire to honour his dead body with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander cauſed to bee couered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be ſet vpon it. Theſe things well conſidered, as they giue credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, ſo they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaues his body in the hands of Tomyris. Q. Curt. l. 7. Xen. ped. 8. Zon. l. 2. c. 20.

And

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Army of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his son would so soone haue transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyses beene able in such haste to haue vndertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleeue Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged & in peace: and that finding in himselfe that he could not long enioy the world, he called vnto him his Nobility, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himselfe, and taught others of the immortality of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deseruing of euery man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he vttered, which make it probable, that he receiued the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he gouerned Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the Prophecy of Esay, wherein he was expressely named, and by God (for the deliuery of his people) preordained. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captiuity, and of restoring the holy Temple and City of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a Gouernment in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth, which must last for euer, though heauen and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

HAuing therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundry Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his seruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Reigne, being perhaps the first that euer he made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captiue Iewes should returne againe into their own Territory, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, hauing now endured and finished the threescore and ten years captiuity, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored vnto them fiue thousand foure hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

1.Esd.2. 2.Esd.7. Phil.in vit. The number of the Iewes which returned out of Chaldæa vnder their Leader Zerubbel, the sonne of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Iechonias, and Iesus or Iosua the sonne of Iosadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soone as they arriued, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselues how to prepare materials for the re-building of the Temple.

1.Esd.3.3. Esd.4.5. Esd.c.4.&.5. Iosl.Ant.11. But no sooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans & other idolatrous Nations adioyning, gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Prouinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort fauoured the Iewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not only those which were but Prouinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe, who hauing the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that what soeuer Cambyses did when himselfe had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: They may herein resolue themselues out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselues affirme, as it is written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was 46. yeares in setting vp, hauing receiued so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

Esd.1.c.5.v.16. Esd.2.v.16. Esd.1.c.5.v.33. Esd.1.c.4.v.5.

And if we seek the naturall and politique courses which moued Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and and forbearing Monarch, we shall find them in that Epistle remembred by Esdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, & the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euermore rebellious and troublers of Kings, Esd.1.c.4.

that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other kings.
But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Cambyses, hauing it in his resolution to inuade Egypt, & that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and giue the same disturbance to Cambyses Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written Ezek.c.29.
in Ezekiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others haue obserued, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Gouernors of Phœnicia complained against the Iewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixt and seuenth chapters of Esdras it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and incloſing of the Citie, as by the reasons giuen in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the sixt of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius, as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahshaste Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reigne of Artahshaste King of Persia; which was as much to say, as after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest son Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaxares his younger son to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one & thirtie yeares, or (according to Iustine) but thirtie.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene Hester.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyses married; Artystona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers haue supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macedonian) had against the Iewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should haue beene Esther, whose Historie seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to haue Greece brought vnder the yoke of Persia, was partly gounded vpon the honour which thereby she thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot giue assent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to haue been one person. For though it be true, that Esther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the king bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation, whereby if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needes haue vnderstood the truth: who neuertheleſſe did ſo well know the parentage of Atoſſa, that for her ſake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her ſonne Xerxes was preferred to the kingdome before his elder brother, against whom alſo he could haue pretended a very weake clayme. But of theſe things more hereafter in fitter place.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Perſian Kings.

OF the ſucceſſors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Perſian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metaſthenes, who hath numbred the Perſian Kings and their times, as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus ioyntly	2	yeares.

Arſes, or Arſames.	4
Darius the laſt, conquered by Alexander.	6

To which Philo agreeth, which number of yeares added, make in all an hundred nintie and one. But in this Catalogue Metaſthenes hath left out Cambyſes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Aſſuerus for the immediate ſucceſſor of Cyrus; in place (ſaith Melanthon) of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes: for Metaſthenes, as Melanthon coniectureth, doth not account Cambyſes in the Catalogue, becauſe his reigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a ſecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Perſian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus haue alſo a differing account from the Greekes, whom neuertheleſſe Euſebius and moſt of the Latines follow, and ſo doth Krentzheim, who hath fully anſwered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this ſort doe the Greekes marſhall the Perſian Kings with the times of their reignes.

This

This account (as I haue said) the most Chronologers and the best learned approue. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Pezel in his historicall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. vers. 22. 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. vers. 1. and often elsewhere.

Secondly Cambyses in the eleuenth of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneua vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemie to the people of God, and stood against them: his great fauour and liberality to the Iewes being elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixt verse is also named Ahasuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainely foretold and described, and the great vvarre which he should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fifly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seuen, vvho is also called Artasastas, 4. lib. 1. Ezra. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5, verse 6. Nehem. cap. 12. verse 22.

Seuenthly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arsames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atossa Cyrus his daughter, and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Astyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Crœsus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reigne to the beginning of the fiue and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The inuasion of Egypt by Cambyses to the third yeare of the threescore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between seuerall formes of computation adde the more credit vnto both.

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentieth yeare after Nabonassar. And the Æra of Nabonassar began on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde euery memorable accident to fall out right with each computation. Piol. in Alm. lib. 3. c. 8.

For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twenty Iulian yeares, and an hundred and fortie dayes from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Iulie in the seuenth yeare of Cambyses.

The Greekes and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyses in the second or third yeare of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyses seuenth yeare in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, vvho succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and sixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (obseruing the differences of Nabonassars Æra & the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeares) it agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, sauing that he ioyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greeke computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements & confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian kings formerly rehearsed, doth giue the greater credit to this of the Greekes, vvhich being constant in it selfe, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise vvith the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

VVE will therefore according to the truth giue the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, sauing the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof he was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the north. Ctesias with others giue him a longer reigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before receiued.

Lib. 2. c. 2. Her. l. 3. pag. 83. 84. 85.

In the fifth yeare of his sole reigne, and in the third yeare of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius he inuaded Egypt, and hauing ouerthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not onely causèd him to be slaine, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias giue for cause of this Warre (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis king of Egypt, to haue his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoeuer it were, true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and causèd the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrtæus, his successour; who enioyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers giue him sixe yeares.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battell he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered king, but that he also trusted him with the gouernment of Egypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or suspition therof, he causèd him to be slaughtered. But the race of this king was not so extirpated, if we may beleeue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Son called Inarus, who causèd the Egyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the king of Egypt, who died before his arriuall, that he causèd his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after diuers indignities vsed, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the wormes might not deuoure them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feede it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romanes euer consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who causèd his owne to be deuoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himselfe had vntombed the carkasse of Caius Marius after his death, *Her. l. 3. §. III.

The rest of Cambyses his acts.

AFter this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyses sent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Euelthon king thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himselfe in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he causèd the Images themselues, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torne downe and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Iupiter Ammon; but the Diuell in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is couered, as the Persians were there-with choked and ouer-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misaduenture, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, vvhich himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troupe had tried, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings haue power ouer men, yet the Elements do not obey them, according to that old English prouerbe, Go, saith the King, Stay, saith the Tide.

After

After his returne from the attempt of Æthiopia, he causèd Apis the Egyptian Bull, vvorshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and bin executed as in seruice of him that onely is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And hauing married his own sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himselfe, with child, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyses, That because his predecessors obserued religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Iudges, and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne sister: it being his own intent so to doe. The Iudges (vvho had alwayes either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselues; & so, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerant occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Iudges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselues. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings priuate satisfaction, he causèd Sisamnus one of his Iudges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestuous match, to be flayed a-liue, for an vniust iudgement giuen, and the same his hide to be hung vp ouer the iudgement seate. After which, bestowing the fathers Office on his son, he willed him to remember, that the same partialitie deserued the same punishment. Her. p. 89. 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercisèd against the sonne of his beloued Praxaspes was very strange & vngratefull. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many obserued, that he tooke more than vsuall delight in the taste of Wine. With which taxation inflamed, he vsed this replication: And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me that I haue in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they haue done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath bin spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the fame be accounted true, and my subiects beleeued. This being spoken, he immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent childe, who falling downe dead vvith the stroke, Cambyses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reioycing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolue thy self that I haue not lost my wittes with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercisèd, til at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi (Cadrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affaires, taking aduantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest themselues of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his sword dis-sheathing, pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late, & remedilesse repentance of the slaughter vvhich he had executed vpon his own brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight yeeres, accounting therein those seuen Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was absent.

In Cambyses the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome giues him a daughter called Pantaptes, and a son called Orontes, who being drowned in the Riuer Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes. Zonaras Com. 2. p. 117.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe,

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum betweene Cambyſes and Darius.

Cyrus and his two ſons being now dead, and the Kingdome in the poſſeſſion of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Prouinciall Gouernours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyſus, Aſphathines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all deſcended from Achæmenes the firſt Perſian King, ſhaking diſcouered the fraud of this impoſture, ioyned their forces together, ſurpriſed and rooted out the Conſpirator with his Companions, and aſſiſtants. In which action (ſaith Iuſtine) Intaphernes and Aſphatines were ſlaine: but Herodotus otherwiſe, that they were onely vvounded, for he auoweth, that all the ſeuen Princes were preſent at the election following.

For the Empire being now vvithout a Gouernour, theſe Princes grew into conſultation how the ſame might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the ſeuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities ſhould confederate, and by iuſt lawes defend their liberty in equalitie, giuing diuers reaſons for his opinion, being as it ſeemed greatly terrified, by the cruelties of Cambyſes; As firſt, that it was not ſafe to giue all power to any one, ſeeing greatneſſe it ſelfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, & the libertie and freedome in all things is moſt apt to inſult, and to commit all manner of vvicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants doe commonly vſe the ſeruices of wicked men, and fauour them moſt; they vſurp vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wiues by force, and deſtroy whom they pleaſe without iudgement.

Megabyſus vvas of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude vvas thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without iudgement, runne into buſineſſe and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouerbearing flouds.

He therefore thought it ſafeſt to make election of a few, and thoſe of the beſt, wiſeſt, and moſt vertuous; becauſe it is euer found, that excellent Counſailes are euer had from excelent men.

Darius gaue the third iudgement, who perſwaded the creation of a king, becauſe euen among few diuturnitie of concord is ſeldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the diſcord of many Rulers hath inforc't the election of one Supreme. It vvere therefore, ſaith Darius, farre ſafer to obſerue the lawes of our Countrie, by which Kingly gouernment hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the ſame Imperiall gouernment by God eſtabliſhed, and made proſperous. And to auoid partialitie, it vvas accorded, that the morning following theſe ſeuen Princes ſhould mount on Horſbacke, and on him the kingdome ſhould be conferred, whoſe horſe after the Sun-riſing ſhould firſt ney or bray. In the euening after this appointment vvas made, it is ſaid that Darius conſulted with the Maſter of his horſe Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the Citie where the election was reſolued of, cauſed the ſame Horſe, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as ſoone as he came into the ſame place vvas the firſt horſe that brayed. Whereupon the other fiue Princes deſcended from their horſes, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Herl. 3. p. 100. 101.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the ſeuen Princes, whereof Darius himſelfe was one, that deliuered the Empire from the vſurpation of the Magi, he diuided the whole into ſeuen gouernments; Herodotus ſaith, into twenty Satrapies.

Of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes.

§. I.

Of Darius his Lineage.

Darius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achæmenidæ, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successor. For in this sort Herodotus deriues him as before

Cyrus the first, who had Teispius, who begat
Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsames, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes. Curt. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made iealous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouernor of the Persian Magi. He afterwards followed Cambyses into Egypt, he then ioyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wiues. Her. l. 1. & 3.

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius these three sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece, Artarnes, Artabernes, and Artabanus, who disswaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hystaspes had also a daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedony, and married the daughter of Darius Artozostra his Cosen germaine.

Herodotus giues to Hystaspes fiue sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Ariarmes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Gouernment, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius deuised equall lawes whereby his subiects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue accesse to all his subiects, and behaued himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselues to become his Vassals: Only he layed diuers payments and taxes on the people, which had not beene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteene hundred fiue hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyses made afarre off in Egypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoake, whereof Darius being aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State reuolted. But finding the seruice a difficult worke, he vsed the seruice of Zopirus, who for the loue he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flye to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for hauing giuen him aduise to giue ouer the siege of their Citie, had in this sort disfeatured and deformed him: whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that Credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throwes giuen to the Persians vpon set time, he deliuered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths. Her. l. 3.

§. III.

Of Darius his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

IN the second yeare of Darius, he gaue order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuenues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Prouinces which are situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phenicians, & mid-land Sea, (whom Esra calleth the Captaines beyond the Riuer) had hindred the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to giue any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselues, and get them farre off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis; with-draw your selues farre from them; In our English, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie, and Temple, now in building. Esra.6.

He also made a decree, vvhich concerned his owne Subiects, That whosoeuer should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God; That hath caused his name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, &c. In foure yeares after which decree (the Iewes being really furnished vvith money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to vvit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeare of Darius Histaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne. Esra.11. Esra.6.

§. IIII.

Of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recouery of Babylon he inuaded the Scythians, whose King Instin calleth Lanthinus, and saith, that Darius vndertooke this warre against him, because he refused him his daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, he built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the Riuer Ister or Danubius, & gaue the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians, & Aolians, among whom vvas Miltiades, vvho perswaded the Asian Grecians, to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiaus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrey, because they ioyned themselues to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaues, for as much as they would not run away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, vvhen they were presented with as faire an occasion of liberty as could haue been desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desart Countrie called Bessarabie, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians vvere then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They vvere not Plough-men, but Grasiers, driuing their Heards from one place to another, as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons vvherin they carried their wiues and children. These Waggons they place at euery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Agra, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and vvasted his prouision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or liuing creatures, nor any thing at all, vvhich either he himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might grieue his enemies; he began to perceiue his owne folly, and the danger into vvhich he had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a bad game, he sent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour & fortune in plaine battaile: Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeelde by Herod. Iust. Diod.l.11.

by faire meanes, and become his Subiect, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and fiue Arrowes: which dumbe shew Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that he did yeelde all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seuen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a right, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dyue vnder the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Scythians themselues, who assailed the Persian campe, drane the horse-men into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night; were so feareless of this great Monarch, and so litle regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his sight, they did not forbeare the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsooke his Campe by night, making many fires, & leauing all that were sicke and weake behinde him, & so with all speede marched away towards the Riuer Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriuing at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian king should neuer more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly bin proued true, had not Hystiaus the Milesian preuailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to seeke him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian warre.

Darius hauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the inuasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre he imployed Megabasus, who mastered the Pæonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the son of Syssamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false iudgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria and * Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who hauing now reduced vnder his obeysance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soueraignty ouer that kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle words, and afterward inuited them to a solemne & magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and presumed vpon their greatnesse, & many victories, began to vse such imbrancings, and other lasciuious behauiour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to withdraw himselfe from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadours, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselues for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-fauoured young-men to clothe themselues in the same garments, & to vse the same attires which the Ladies had worne at the feast, giuing them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were prouided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after giuen by Darius for a seuere reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somwhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the inuasion of Attica intended, so preuailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall vpon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

The

§. VI.

The first occasion of the Warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with a rehearsall of the gouernment in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOw the better to vnderstand the reason and motiues of that great War, vvhich followed soone after, betweene the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Neither do I hold it any impertinency, to be large in vnfolding euery circumstance of so great a businesse as gaue fire to those wars, which neuer could be throughly quenched, vntill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, & other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, & in seuerall times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Iudæa, so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember againe the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient policie vnder Kings, though these also after some fifteene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former gouernement from Monarchicall to Princes for tearme of life, of which Medon the son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of these there were twelue Generations besides Medon, to wit.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisedome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three & thirtieth yeere of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after ages deriued vnto the Romanes, and by the Decem viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne dayes violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice practice and maintenance of a popular gouernment; the state of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles & Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, & fained that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue beene slaine for his loue to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himselfe Lord of the towne; Hegesistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in euery change of gouernment had sought to remoue themselues further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driuen for lacke of helpe to flye the towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycurgus (ioyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded vpon the dissension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soone after reedified by the new breaking out of the old factiõs. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the vsuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage, by which alliance the Family of the Alcmeonidæ, vvherof Megacles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmeonidæ, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanor towards his Wife. Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus vpon the first discouery of their intent, perceiued no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleuen yeares. Which time being expired, hauing hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recouered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he gouerned Athens seuenteene yeares, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three yeares, saith Elianus, but as Iustine hath it, foure and thirty, accounting the time belike as well before as after his seuerall expulsions. Herodotus giues the Father and the Son fiue and thirtie yeares; Aristotle fiue and thirty. But Thucidides affirmeth, that he died very old, leauing for his Successours his two sons Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise vpon his brother had more & deeper rootes than were apparant, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a strait amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose son Hyppoclus he gaue one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practise against himselfe, he began to vse the Citizens with great seuerity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised, during their vsurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuery: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmanide, together with an Armie of the Lacedæmonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias that by composition he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarking himselfe, tooke land at Sigeum*, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia gouerned by Æantides, who presented him to Darius. He was depriued of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twenty yeares before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius,

Thus farre I haue digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him solicite & perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most vrgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betweene Greece and Persia.

ANother, and a strong motiue to this expedition, was the Ionick warre, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, hauing enioyed their libertie about 500. yeares, euen from the Ionick migration, to the time of Crœsus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Seruants to the Crowne of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebell against vpon euery aduantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Grecians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselues.

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian bin giuen vnto them for bridles to hold them in subiection. Euery one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subiection. And this their duitful affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had bin lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of seruice Histiæus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thankes, as hauing beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythian, or carried away with their owne desires, were ready to haue abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histiæus (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already receiued at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Susa, where hee detained him with all kinde vsage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemie, he could not start away. Histiæus had subtilty enough to discouer the kings purpose which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territory, than to sit & feast at the great Kings table, & heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was managed, being himselfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a priuate man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resoluing vpon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduising him to stirre vp some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who hauing failed in an enterprise vpon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsaile: & the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyrannie, and did set Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he took and sold as slaues to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof he lately had beene Admirall in the enterprise of Naxos, he had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers

Officers and Captaines; so that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, vnlesse he were able to raise an Army that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a iourny to Sparta, where having assayed in vaine with many arguments, and the offer of fifty talents, to win to his party Cleomenes King of the Lacedæmonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had beene sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, desiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, hauing found very churlish entertainment. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinity with the Ionians, & the persuasions of Aristagoras, drew them on a-pace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretriants furnished fiue more, in regard of the ancient kindnes that had passed between the Ionians & them. With these and their owne forces ioyned, the Ionians entered the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which aduantage they surprised Sardis, when no enemy was heard of or suspected; insomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safety, than by retreating himself into the castle; which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the City flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, strengthened by the riuer Pactolus, which ran through it; and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselues, and charged their enemies; who well aduising themselues, made all the haste they could toward the sea side. But Artaphernes hauing gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, & found them neere Ephesus; where setting resoluedly vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Army, the rest sauing themselues in Ephesus. In this fight Eualides Captaine of the Eretrians perished: but his fame and memory was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserued. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent vnto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could rayse. Wherefore the Ionians bratuely proceeding, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacy with the Ionians, who were able to giue them aide by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the eare of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, vpon whom he vowed to take sharp reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, & their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not haue dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gaue onely some forme and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like enough to haue proceeded, though he had perished ere it were aduanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Nauie of three hundred and sixty saile against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In euery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, not all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vpper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neyther was that victory of any vse to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being vtterly beaten by the Persian Army at Land, and reduced into their old subiection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recouered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities: when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colony of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territory belike he landed, ouerthrew him, & cut his troups in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who hauing vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this euasion preserued him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seems that he would haue done, by the buriall which he commanded to be giuen to his dead body that was crucified; and by his heauie taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselues, without his helpe. The strength of their City by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet, which promised vnto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to try the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauy was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking him vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should haue assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wiues and children made slaues, and their goods a booty to the Persians, whom for sixe years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The warre which Darius made vpon Greece, with the battaile of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eritræans, who ioyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselues; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after diuers encounters forc't them to giue pledges, and to relinquish the party of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demaratus to bee deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victory, by reason of these discords, alienations, and ciuill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleete of shippes fit to transport his Army ouer the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Army he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty yeares before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders hauing their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, imbarked

Herod. lib. 6. Whether this Citie or People were of Peloponesus in Sicyonia, or of Aegea, between Thessalia and Macedon, I doe not know: but those borderers, and next the enemie, were more likely to compound than the rest farre off.

There is also a City called Aeginum, not farre from Aegea, Liuie 32.33, &c.

imbarked themselues in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels, and first of all inuested the Ilands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Ægean Sea, but on the contrary they might alwayes both receiue themselues in their passage, and shrowde themselues from all suddaine tempest and surrage.

To this end they first possest themselues of Samos, secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natiue. Which Island Darius did not only forbeare to sacke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And hauing recouered these and other Ilands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that citie, (as already hath beene shewed) In Herod. had assisted the Ionians at the taking & firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after sixe daies assault, partly by force, & in part by the treason of Euphorbus and Philagrus, they tooke it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubœa the Persians past their Army into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and approching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arriued, wherin they were to dispute with their own vertues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their liberty, for their wiues, their children, and their liues, put themselues in the best orden they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victory, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battaile to assist them & defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing hee could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was somewhat likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue bin more stirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any iust cause or solide reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselues, with one thousand onely of the Platæans (who hauing beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremity witnesse their thankefulnesse and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselues into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platæans. In the end, and after great diuersity of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battell, preuailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselues into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the body of a battaile. The Persians when they perceiued so small a troupe aduancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispossest of their vnderstanding, than possest with the resolution whereof they made shew. So inuincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians preuailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered & put in rout; the Athenians following their victory euen to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saued themselues in their ships.

The Persian Army consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place sixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, eyther by strange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Army, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe, in their disordered retrait, or rather in their hastie flying away. As for Iustines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Army were slaine, the same hath no appearance nor possibility of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slaine, saith Iustine and Cicero; but Suidas tels vs, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos. Ad Att.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus & Stesilaus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to haue held it from putting off the shore, & hauing his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left, of which also being depriued, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeare of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the warre made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans; Alexander the son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Gouernour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilides, after Halycarnassæus. In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing ouer his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after five and twenty dayes assault hee brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his Companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forgetting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fifty Talents; where his weake and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuy of the better sort to each other, with their priuate Factions, assisted by the vnthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subiection and slauery. Miltiades left behinde him one son called Cymon, begotten on Hegesipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in iustice and good gouernment.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than sorrow for the losse receiued in Greece, gaue order for new leuies of men, & all other warlike prouisions. But the Egyptians reuolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength & reuenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinuasion of Greece. The dissension also among his sons; of whom, the younger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdained to giue place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations and enterprises, and ioyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had reigned sixe and thirty yeares. He left behinde him fiue sons, namely Artabasanes, borne before he obtained the Kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes Gouernour of Egypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

Chap. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

Xerxes receiued from his father, as hereditary, a double Warre; one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Græcians; of which it is hard to iudge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were diuided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, vnder Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artazostres, perswaded by many arguments the Europæan warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late inuasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Army and his Honour;

Hetherto besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselfe in this businesse. For whatsoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of his owne nature, which only the diuine Prouidence, and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Græcian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the Warre of Egypt was ended, foure yeares were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this inuasion: which being compounded of all Nations subiect to the Persian Empire, consisted of seuenteene hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleeue Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number lesse by seuen hundred thousand footmen. Her. l. 7.

The Commanders of the seuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature giuen, some few people excepted, who had of their owne Leaders.

The charge of the whole Army was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobryas by a sister of Darius, to whom were ioyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kinred, as Generals ouer all; sauing that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was giuen to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Darius, who commanded the late Army of Darius in Greece.

The Fleete of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellespontines; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia; as by Ariabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnassus, and the Ilands adioyning, which herselfe commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the reſt of the Fleet, excepting thoſe of Zidon, in which Xerxes himſelfe was imbarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Army entertained by Pythius: hiscutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boates ouer the Helleſpont: and the diſcourſe betweene him and Artabanus vpon the view of the Army.

WHen this world of an Army was throughly furniſhed, he cauſed all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous, & repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had aſſembled to the number of ſeuenteene hundred thouſand foot, as he entred the body of Celænas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Army. The Feaſt ended, he alſo preſented him with two thouſand Talents of ſiluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting ſeuen thouſand of the Perſian Darics, which make ſo many of our Markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberality of Pythius, did not onely refuſe his treaſure offered, but cõmanded that ſeuen thouſand Darici ſhould be giuen him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, ſo many thouſands were wanting when he made the preſent. But ſoone after, when Pythius beſought him to ſpare one of his fiue ſonnes from his attendance into Greece (becauſe himſelfe was old, and had none whom he could ſo well truſt as his owne ſon) Xerxes moſt barbarouſly cauſed the young man, for whom his father ſought exemption, to be ſundered into two parts, commanding, that the one halfe of his carkaſe ſhould be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Army marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-ſide. The one was a paſſage for Gallies to be cut behinde Mount Athos; making the ſame (with the halfe Iſland or Headland, whereon it ſtood) to be an entire Iſland, ſundring thereby from the Continent of Trace fiue Cities, beſides the Mountaine & the Cherſoneſus or Necke of Land it ſelfe: a worke of more oſtentation than of vſe, and yet an enterpriſe of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelue furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to paſſe in front. The Cities ſo ſeuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyſus, and Cleonæ.

He alſo gaue order, that a Bridge vpon Boats ſhould be made ouer the Helleſpont betweene Abidus & Seſtos, the Sea there hauing a myle of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which after the finiſhing, was by a Tempeſt torne aſunder and diſſeuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than diſcouraged, commanded thoſe to bee ſlaine that were maſters of the worke, and cauſed ſixe hundred threeſcore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and induſtry of the Phœnicians was ſo well anchored to reſiſt both winds blowing into & from the Euxine Sea, as the ſame being well boorded and rayled, the whole Army of ſeuenteen hundred thouſand foot, and foureſcore thouſand Horſe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, paſt ouer it into Europe in ſeuen dayes & ſeuen nights, without intermiſſion. This tranſportation of Armies did Cæſar afterward vſe. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finiſhed, and the Army brought neere to the Sea-ſide, Xerxes tooke a view of all his Troupes, aſſembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried vp, and ſeated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after hee had gloried in his owne happineſſe, to behold and command ſo many Nations, and ſo powerfull an Army and Fleet, hee ſuddenly (notwithſtanding) burſt out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeares there ſhould not any one ſurulue of that maruellous multitude: the cauſe of which ſudden change of paſſion when he vttered to Artabanus his Vncle, Artabanus ſpake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the diſſolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it ſelfe which we enioy is yet more miſerable than the end thereof: for in thoſe few dayes giuen vs in the world, there there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that euer found himselfe so accompanied with happines, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire & hope of death, than of liuing; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrowes whereto mankinde is subiect, being so many and inuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear vnto vs ouer-long. To auoid all which there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the inuasion of Greece, against which he had formerly giuen many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him. Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous: Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe: Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet hee told the King, That there were two things which marueilously affrighted him; and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet; insomuch as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receiue them, nor all the Hauens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to vnderstand, that in such a case of extremity, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the vnsatiate desire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth leade him forward: for were there no man found to giue resistance, yet the want of meanes to feede such an Army, and the Famine, which cannot be preuented, will without any other violence offered dis-inable and consume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to haue diuerted Xerxes, not daring perchance to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Army it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For, to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnderstanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second vpon England in the year 1588. who had belike neuer heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was very likely, that Xerxes his Army, which could not haue in it lesse than two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Machiauels words, Mouths sometimes eate, die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, sterile and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food besides what serued themselues for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they neuer meant to entertaine, but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall what soeuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleeue Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being renieued at Thermopylæ, consisted of fiue millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses; and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to prouide for all things; and that whosoeuer should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be obiected of accidentall inconueniences, he should neuer pursue the same further, than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had neuer growne to that greatnesse, or possest so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to bee condemned, if any necessity had enforc't him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could bee constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured; and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne iudgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace & Macedon) were an argument, that hee rather hoped to feare the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those vncountable multitudes; Non vires habent, sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in forces, and rather a loggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army, so the diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his fiue millions compounded ten Armies of fifty thousand chosen souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled & furnished, he had either preuailed by the sword, or forced them to forfait their territory, or brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot bee resisted. But while Xerxes resolued to cut downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceiued both of his owne hopes, and in their beare whom hee imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, hee himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprise, was in the Summer following vtterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Army ouer the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leauing the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the Riuer of Lissus was drunke dry by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Pissyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, & the shamefull & incredible ouerthrowes which he receiued. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which diuide Thessaly from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ & Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, & other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seuen hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole daies together against that huge Army of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first daies fight, Xerxes is said to haue three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Army by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vtterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had proued vaine, he was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might haue continued, had not a run-agate Græcian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Army might ascend the ledge of Mountains, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Army had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, & seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had vndertaken to make good, & with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes hauing lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers & Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not bin present at these battailes, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring into the field. It is reported of Dienekes the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hide the Sun when it shined, he answered thus; It is very good newes: for then shall wee fight in the cooler shade. Such notable resolution hauing as freely been expressed in deeds, as it was vttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the city of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, & that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus a banished king of the Spartans, who had alwaies well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which ioineth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoile the country, & to hold the Lacedæmonians & their neighbours busied at home; whilest Xerxes at his leasure hauing subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining destitute of the rest, would be too weake alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neer to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should bee verified, that it were better for his Country-men to haue that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconueniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might haue taken, had it bin followed, it is not easie to ghesse. But a contrary opinion of Achæmenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grieuous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to giue them succour. Therfore Achæmenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of foure hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek aduentures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Nauy, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-army and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course, & lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceiued, for about the same time that his army had felt the valour of the Greeks by land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill & courage at sea. The Grecians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Euboea, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayle about the Iland to fall vpon them behinde, vsing like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which diuideth Euboea from the maine, was in the same sort held by a Nauy of two hundred threescore & eleuen saile against the huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopylæ had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumuented, as this Nauy might haue bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, & the cause of their voyage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleet, and soone enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting saile by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking & sinking thirty vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driuen vpon the rocks and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Nauy of the Greeks was increased by the arriuall of fifty three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their party in the last fight. As these new forces incouraged the one side: so the feare of Xerxes his displeasure stirred vp the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policy, they resolued in plaine fight to repaire their honour, & casting themselues into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether gether as he auie vpon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse beate it. Herein only the Barbarians may seeme to haue had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leauing the wrack & spoils to the enemy, who neuertheless were fain to abandon presently euen the passage which they had vndertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crusht in the battaile, & especially because they had receiued aduertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylæ. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, General of the Athenians, engraued vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should reuolt vnto the Greekes, or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IV.

WHen Xerxes had passed the straits of Thermopylæ, he wasted the country of the Phocians, & the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flye, and reserue themselues to a day of battell, than to aduenture their liues into his hands, vpon hope of sauing their wealth, by making proffer vnto him of their seruice. Part of his army he sent to spoyle the Temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there beene made by diuers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentory than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell vpon the companies which arriued at the Temple to haue sacked it, and of two Rockes that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who liued not long after, saith, That the broken Rockes remained euen to his memory in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleeued that Apollo was a god, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of inriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherfore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impiety, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holy one, who saith, Will a man spoile his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Goe to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heede, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the City of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground & cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeede, in the enterprise against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couetousnesse so much the more vgly, by how much the more themselues had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kinde by meere mischance.

Malac. 3. 8. Ierem. c. 2. v. 9. & 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: Hee came to Athens, which finding forsaken, hee tooke and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeede was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdome, who litterally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safe in wodden wals, had fortified that place with Boords and Palissadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might haue yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied vpon the prophecy: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

§. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had before the comming of Xerxes remoued their wiues and children into Troezene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, & the common liberty of Greece. Neuertheless, this great great zeale, which the Athenians did ſhew for the generall good of their Country, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to ſtay for them at Salamis, whileſt they remoued their wiues & children out of the City. But when the city of Athens was taken, it was preſently reſolued vpon, that they ſhould forſake the Ile of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Iſthmus: which necke of land they did purpoſe to fortifie againſt the Perſians, & ſo to defend Peloponneſus by land & ſea, leauing the reſt of Greece as indefenſible, to the fury of the enemy. So ſhould the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina haue been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there beſtowed as in places of ſecurity) haue beene giuen ouer into mercileſſe bondage. Againſt this reſolution Themiſtocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleet, very ſtrongly made oppoſition; but in vaine. For the Peloponneſians were ſo poſſeſſed with feare of loſing their owne, which they would not hazzard, that no perſwaſions could obtaine of them, to regard the eſtate of their diſtreſſed Friends and Allies. Many remonſtrances Themiſtocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis; As firſt in priuate vnto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian, Admiral of the whole Fleet; That the ſelf-ſame feare which made them forſake thoſe coaſts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no checke at the firſt) cauſe them alſo to diſſeuer the Fleet, and euery one of the Confederates to with-draw himſelf to the defence of his owne City and Eſtate: Then to the Councell of Warre, which Eurybiades vpon this motion did call together (forbearing to obiect what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he ſhewed that the fight at Iſthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, hauing the fewer ſhips, to determine the matter in the ſtreights; and that, beſides the ſafeguard of Ægina, Megara, and Salamis, they ſhould by abiding where they then were, ſufficiently defend Iſthmus, which the Barbarians ſhould not ſo much as once look vpon, if the Greeks obtained victory by ſea; which they could not ſo well hope for elſwhere, as in that preſent place which gaue him ſo good aduantage. All this would not ſerue to retaine the Peloponneſians, of whom one, vnworthy of memory, vpbraided Themiſtocles with the loſſe of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for ſuffering one to ſpeake in the Councell, that had no Country of his owne to inhabite. A baſe and ſhamefull obiection it was, to lay as a reproach that loſſe, which being voluntarily ſuſtained for the common good, was in true eſtimation by ſo much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignity did exaſperate Themiſtocles, and put into his mouth a reply ſo ſharpe, as auailed more than all his former perſwaſions. He told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer City, than any Nation of Greece could boaſt of; hauing well-neere two hundred good ſhippes of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was eaſie for them to tranſport their Families and ſubſtance into any part of the World, and ſettle themſelues in a more ſecure habitation, leauing thoſe to ſhift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refuſed to ſtand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italy belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he ſaid an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in proceſſe of time ſhould build it a-new, & there (quoth he) will we plant our ſelues, leauing vnto you a ſorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your own vnthankfulneſſe. The Peloponneſians hearing thus much, began to enter into better conſideration of the Athenians, whoſe affaires depended not, as they well perceiued, vpon ſo weak termes, that they ſhould be driuen to crouch to others; but rather were ſuch, as might inforce the reſt to yeeld to them, and condeſcend euen to the vttermoſt of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they firſt embraced that Heroicall reſolution of leauing their grounds and houſes to fire and ruine, if neceſſity ſhould inforce them ſo farre, for the preſeruation of their liberty; did imploy the moſt of their priuate wealth, and all the common treaſure, in building a great Nauie. By theſe meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no ſuch calamity ſhould befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoiſed by great aduantages at Sea: Knowing wel, that a ſtrong fleet would either procure victory at home, or a ſecure paſſage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it ſufficient, if building a few new ſhips, they did ſomwhat amend their Nauie. Wherby it came to paſſe, that, had they bin vanquiſhed, they could not haue expected any other fortune than either preſent death or perpetual ſlauery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, whoſe forces by sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and foure score bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would haue stood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had forsaken them; were soon perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad euent, to forget the lesser, which they had conceiued of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent brauery, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giuing battaile: and how Themistocles by policy held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victory at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conuenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giuing such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed vpon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greek Nauie (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should presently be disseuered, and euery one seeking to preserue his owne City and goods, they should, being diuided, proue vnable to resist him, who had won so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall vndergoe, than any need requireth vs to aduenture vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would haue done, we sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the iourny to Peloponnesus is vtterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soon reuolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related vnto his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolued vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse haue beene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not feare and flattery made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne iudgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped vpon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Ægalæus; which is opposite vnto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, hauing Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behauiour of euery Captaine. The neere approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countri-men shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Army, marching a-pace thither; did now againe so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreaty, nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesse to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeuour to saue that which remained vnconquered; propounding chiefly to themselues what misery would befall them, if losing the victory, they should be driuen into Salamis, there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolued forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently been done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiuing what a violent fear had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholesome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to finde him busie in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake vp, he dispatched secretly a trusty Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truely of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might preuent their escape; giuing them withall a false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeued these good newes, well knowing that the victory was their owne assured, aſſured, if the Athenian fleet ioyned with them; which they might eaſily hope, conſidering what abilitie their Maſter had to recompence for ſo doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with reſtitution of their Citie, and Territories. By theſe meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themſelues incloſed round with Perſians, who had laboured hard all that night, ſending many of their ſhips about the Iſle of Salamis, to charge the enemie in reare, and landing many of their men in the Iſle of Pſittalea, which lyeth ouer againſt Salamis, to ſaue ſuch of their owne, and kill ſuch of the Gracian partie, as by any misfortune ſhould bee caſt vpon the ſhore. Thus did meere neceſſity enforce the Gracians to vndertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victory, ſtemming the foremoſt of their enemies, and chaſing the reſt, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conueniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkeable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearieſome taske of writing downe many diſaſters that befell the Perſian fleet; which ill acquitted it ſelfe that day, doing no one piece of ſeruice worthy the preſence of their King, or the regiſtring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well ſeeme to haue wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was aſcribed to thoſe of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ſhips of Aegina hauing poſſeſſed the Straights, did ſinke or take them, whileſt the Athenians did valiantly giue charge vpon thoſe that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of reſiſting.

Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFter this victore, the Greeks intending by way of ſcrutinie, to determine which of the Captaines had beſt merited of them, in all this great ſeruice; euery Captain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the firſt place write down his own name, but in the ſecond place, as beſt deſeruing next vnto himſelfe, almoſt euery Suffrage did concur vpon Themiſtocles. Thus priuate affection yeelded vnto verture, as ſoone as her owne turne was ſerued. The Perſian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in ſuch faſhion, that they which were beſt acquainted with his temper, might eaſily diſcerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Eſpecially Mardonius, Author of the warre, beganne to caſt a wary eye vpon his Maſter, fearing leſt his counſell ſhould bee rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoſing rather to aduenture his life in purſuite of the victorie, than to caſt it away by vndergoing his Princes indignation; hee aduiſed the King to leaue vnto him three hundred thouſand men, with which forces hee promiſed to reduce all Greece vnder the ſubiection of the Perſian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to ſooth Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, That the cowardiſe of thoſe Aegyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than ſlaues, who had ſo ill behaued themſelues in the late Sea-ſeruice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies beene victorious, and had already ſubdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it ſelf, againſt which the Warre was principally intended. Theſe words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who preſently betooke himſelfe to his iourney homewards, making the more haſt, for that he vnderſtood, how the Greekes had a purpoſe to ſaile to Helleſpont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his paſſage. True it was that the Greekes had no ſuch intent, but rather wiſhed his haſty departure, knowing that hee would leaue his Armie not ſo ſtrong, as it ſhould haue beene, had he in perſon remained with it. And for this cauſe did Eurybiades giue counſell, that by no meanes they ſhould attempt the breaking of that bridge, leſt neceſſitie ſhould inforce the Perſians to take more courage; and rather to fight like men, than die like beaſts. Wherefore Themiſtocles did, vnder pretence of friendſhip, ſend a falſe aduertiſment vnto this timorous Prince, aduiſing him to conuay himſelfe into Aſia with all ſpeed, before his bridge were diſſolued: which counſel Xerxes tooke very kindly, and haſtily followed, as before is ſhewed. Whether it were ſo that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repaſſed into Aſia; or whether it were torne in ſunder by tempeſts, and he thereby driuin to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. Howsoeuer it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country; that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians; after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawne himselfe into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses receiued; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wiues and children; for as much as they well perceiued that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, vnderstanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest he should finde good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriuing before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their persuasion to retaine the Athenians firm. They alledged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselues in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leaue them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses thereof bee ruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee vndertake to maintaine as our owne, your wiues and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who haue alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slauery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to vse many arguments to the Athenians, who gaue answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might seeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wiues and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselues, onely desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, hauing once receiued such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade Attica, they found themselues nothing deceiued. For hee, as soone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his armie towards them, and their Citie: they hauing now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselues into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arriuall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not onely to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserue them from fire, and to haue those which were already laid waste, reedified at the kings charges: Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needs they would relie vpon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly aduance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bewonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrsilus

Cyrsilus aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people, all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house, heard what he had said, immediately set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or mony, that had moued him to vtter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceiued the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in going them aide, they were faine to betake themselues to Salamis againe, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very seuere messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknes, & threatning withal, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which euery day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded a-thwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careless & dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quick resolution, giuing them plainly to vnderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Grecian Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe seruice where need should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might haue befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had aduentured ouer-farre. So mutuall feare preserued in quiet the Ilands lying in the midst of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and seasonably obserued by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gaue eare to Mardonius: considering that many doores would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as soone as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians vpon this admonition, making better perusall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to giue satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherfore dispatching away fiue thousand Spartans in the euening, vnder conduct of Pausanias; they gaue audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse, deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already farre vpon the iourney; and giuing them leaue to take vp other fiue thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adioyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of grauity, in a matter so important, were neuertheless contented with the finall conclusion; & leuying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Grecians were nothing slacke in sending forth Companies, whose neare approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disaduantage to Horse; wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating downe the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of War.

The great battaile of Platea.

IT were too long a rehearsall to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greekes and him, in the Country of Bœotia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seate of that Warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adioyned the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Campe with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leauied an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thouſand were weightily armed, the reſt were only aſſiſtants to theſe forty thouſand, being armed more ſlightly, as rather to make excurſions and giue chaſe, than to ſuſtaine any ſtrong charges.

Theſe two Armies hauing eleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of ſeruice; Mardonius, whoſe victuals began to faile, reſolued to begin the fray. The Greekes were promiſed victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proſerpina, making praiers vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphes. But it was hard to find the certaine place which the Oracle deſigned. For the plaine of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was alſo an old Temple of Ceres and Proſerpina, neare vnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewiſe the memorialls of thoſe Nymphes and Demi-gods, were in the ſame place, vpon Mount Citharon, and the ground ſerued well for foot-men againſt horſe; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plateans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whileſt the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plateans to make all cleere, did freely beſtow their land on that ſide the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plateans cauſed Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponneſian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it moſt meet, that the Athenians ſhould ſtand oppoſite that day to the Medes and Perſians, whom they had formerly vanquiſhed at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, ſhould entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and hauing beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius vnderſtanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whoſe valour the Medes & Perſians had felt heauie proofe, or deſiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braueſt Souldiers in Greece) he did alſo change the order of his battaile, and oppoſe himſelfe to Pauſanias. All the Greekes might well perceiue how the Enemy did ſhift his wings, and Pauſanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did alſo the like. Soone whole day was ſpent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Perſians made that day with their Archers on horſe-back, who did ſo moleſt the Greeks at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into conſultation of retiring; becauſe they could not without much loſſe to themſelues, and none to the enemy, lie neare to that fountaine which did ſerue all the Campe. Hauing therefore concluded among themſelues to diſlodge, and part of the Army being ſent away before day-light: Mardonius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him ſeemed to proceed out of meer cowardiſe) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedæmonians being ouer-taken by the enemies horſe, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly ſit ſtill, not making any reſiſtance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and ſlaine, and ſome of eſpeciall marke loſt, before any ſigne of good ſucceſſe appeared in the entrailes.

But as ſoone as Pauſanias had found in the Sacrifice thoſe tokens, which the ſuperſtition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gaue the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did ſit vpon the ground, as was their manner, aroſe altogether, and with excellent courage receiued the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of ſuch notable reſiſtance. The reſt of the Greeke Army that was in march, being reuoked by Pauſanias, came in a-pace to ſuccour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arriue vnto the place of the great battaile, becauſe the Thebans, and other Greekes confederated with the Perſians, gaue them checke by the way. Neuertheleſſe, the Spartans with other their aſſiſtants, did ſo well acquite themſelues, that the Perſians were vanquiſhed, and Mardonius with many thouſands more ſlaine in the field; the reſt fled into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden Walls, and there defended themſelues with ſuch courage as deſperate neceſſity inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, becauſe the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of aſſaulting Fortreſſes, and Walls. In the meane time the Athenians hauing found ſtrong oppoſition of the Thebanes and Theſſalians, did with much labour & courage obtain victory, which hauing not long purſued, they came to help the Lacedæmonians, whom they found wearily buſied in aſſaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themſelues vnder-took it, & in ſhort ſpace forced a paſſage through the Wall; at which breach firſt, and then on all ſides, the Greekes entred with ſuch fury, and luſt deſire of vengeance, that of three hundred thouſand they are ſaid not to haue left three thouſand aliue, excepting thoſe who fledde away with Artabazus, when as the Perſian Army firſt fell to rout.

If the execution were ſo great, as is reported, an eſpeciall cauſe of it was the fooliſh retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were ſo, that the place was well fortified, and the number of thoſe who caſt themſelues into it greater than any of the Aſſailants; yet they being of ſeuerall Nations and Languages and hauing loſt their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impoſſible that they in ſuch a terrour and aſtoniſhment ſhould make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy Country, againſt an Army of men, farre more valiant than themſelues, and enflamed with preſent victory. Therefore the ſame wall which for a few houres had preſerued their liues, by holding out the Enemy, did now impale them, and leaue them to the ſlaughtering fury of vnpitifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theſſaly and other Countries in his way, that hee was ſent by Mardonius vpon ſome piece of ſeruice: For he well knew, that had they vnderſtood any thing of that great diſcomfiture, all places would haue beene hoſtile vnto him, and ſought with his ruine to purchaſe fauour of the vanquiſhers. Therefore making ſo large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and loſt, he came to Byzantium, whence he ſhipped his men ouer into Aſia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vndertaken by Xerxes againſt the Greekes, vpon hope of Honour, and Conqueſt, though ſorting otherwiſe, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-ſeene, and rather worſe, for as much as it began the quarrell, which neuer ended before the ruine of the Perſian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, deſpiſed and ſought to haue beene brought into ſlauery. Hereby it may ſeeme, that the viſion appearing to Xerxes, was from God himſelfe, who had formerly diſpoſed of thoſe things, ordaining the ſubuerſion of the Perſian Monarchie by the Greekes, who thus prouoked, entred into greater conſideration of their owne ſtrength, and the weakneſſe of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a ſtrange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and example of the like.

THe ſame day on which the battaile was fought at Platæa, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Aſia, where the Perſian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greeke Nauy, at the requeſt of ſome Ilanders & Ionians, did ſaile into thoſe parts, to deliuer the Samians, & procure the Ionians to reuolt from the Perſian. Xerxes himſelf at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lidia, not farre from the Sea-ſide, hauing left threeſcore thouſand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coaſt. Therfore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Perſian fleete, vnderſtood that the Greekes bent their courſe towards them; they did forth-with draw their ſhips a ground, fortifying with Paliſſadoes & otherwiſe, as much ground as was needful for the encamping of all their land & ſea-forces. Leutychides at his arriuall, perceiuing that they meant to keep within their ſtrength, & reſoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his gally cloſe aboord the ſhore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Perſians) exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, & vſe the faire occaſion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themiſtocles, who had done the like at Euboa, truſting that either theſe perſwaſions would preuaile, or if the Perſians did happen to vnderſtand them, that it would breed ſome iealouſie in them, cauſing them to fight in feare of their own companions. It need not ſeeme ſtrange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles; did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to reuolt; who now in his declining estate, gaue a willing eare to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded and lesse feared any treason to be contriued by their subiects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their armes, the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these deuices little auailed them. For the Samians perceiuing that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to haue found some that durst beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march towards the Enemies Campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Army, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was giuen out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platea was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the euening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Æmilius ouerthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure dayes, as Liuie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the Riuer Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noysed at Rome: And (which is most remarkeable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Army with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was sodainly reported that Antonius was slaine, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique ioy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tidings could not be found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his iourney against the Rebell; and being now with his Army in march, hee receiued aduertisement by Poste, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe-same victory, he found that the report and victory were borne vpon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make about fiue and twenty hundred miles) a-sunder. It is truely said of Plutarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames) among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit we may finde, that God himselfe doth sometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noyses; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as hee threatned Senacherib, saying: Behold, I will send a blast vpon him, and he shall heare a noyse, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well haue beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heauy hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their owne Country of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platea being noysed among them, euery man desired that his own valour in the present fight might be some help to work out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they diuided themselues into two Battalians, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies Campe; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedæmonians could arriue on the other part) & being desirous to get all the honour of

of the day vp themselues, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselues Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselues by flight. In this fight the Samians did good seruice; as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who vpon the like iealousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages; did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fel into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-pathes. The Lacedæmonians that day did little seruice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such companies as retired in whole troopes, making them flie dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leauied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensiue Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little mind had he to reuenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly giuen ouer to the loue of his Brothers Wife: with whom he could not preuaile by intreaty, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: he thought it best to make a match between his owne Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to finde occasion of such familiarity as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reiect him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him; he soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to gouerne himselfe in peace, as to guide his Army in war. This yong Lady hauing once desired the King to giue her the Garment which he then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiue her husbands conuersation with her, which she imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceiued extreame hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might be giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer she should inflict vpon the innocent Lady, granted the request; & sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that he vnderstood how villainously that poore Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to be vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Masistes refused to put her away; alleadging his owne loue, her deseruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which he had, nor haue his Daughter whom he had promised vnto him. Masistes was much grieued with these words, but much more, when he returned home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Brests in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, & some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Prouince he was Gouernor, intending to rebell & reuenge himselfe. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Army to be leauied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Gouernment, and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is ioyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That he doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should againe erect it, or, for the mischiefe done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoeuer his other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercilesse.

Therefore we may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, & other worse Princes, could not ouerthrow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In warr against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had beene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, nor any of his posterity, did euer make offensiue warre, but receiued many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale serued but as an introduction, teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne doores, than in a forraine Country: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly setled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the History of Greece, taking-in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maiesty of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely vpon the riches and power that had formerly been acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessiue Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that euer were, haue beene eneruated, made vnweildy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poore and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or neuer (vnlesse it were with great aduantage) daring to aduenture the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone haue ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not priuate malice and iealousie vrged euery City to enuie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diuerted the swords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

Chap. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

After that the Medes and Persians had receiued their last blow, & were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leutychides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the reuolted Ionies, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had beene leauied. The Athenians in the meane while besieged Sestos, a City on the strait of the Hellespont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats, where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselues the Winter following on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and hauing left their wiues and children, since the inuasion of Attica, & the abandoning of Athens, in diuers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, & returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and

and the wals of the City ouer-turned, yet they resolued first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to couer themselues, their wiues and children, with any priuate buildings: Whereof the Lacedemonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne City of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themselues, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them; not acknowledging any priuate misslike or ielousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselues than heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to be made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Athenians promised to giue them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their wals to that height, as they cared not for their misslikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedemon, giuing him for excuse, that hee could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, til the arriual of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being conuerted into ielousie (for by the arriuall of diuers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily grown vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleeue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would bee pleased to send some of their owne trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whom he aduised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few daies, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadours, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the wals of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedemonians to beleeue, That whensoeuer it pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for such, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Common-weale & their owne safety, without direction and aduice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselues to the woodden Walls of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne iudgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greekes: And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Iudges of their owne affaires, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the Wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, dissembled their misslike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diuision; & so suffered the Athenians to depart, & receiued backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The Wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselues vpon all occasions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State vpon the Persian.

THe Athenians hauing setled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sayle for Cyprus, vnder the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian; where, after their landing hauing possest themselues of many principall places, they imbarked the Army againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouering from the the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behauing himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately reuolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedamon, and not onely accused of many insolent behauiours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, & Treason against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Dorcas, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that warre, practised the souldiers to complaine; though indeede the wise and vertuous behauiour of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seeme ill in comparison of himselfe, & therefore was much more auaileable, in rendring those detested, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoeuer it were, the Lacedæmonians being no lesse wearied of the warr, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subiected themselues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, & of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receiuers and Treasurers, & began to leuie mony, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recouering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, & the Ilands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was euer payed by the Greeks) amounted to foure hundred and threescore Talents; which was raised easily by the honest care of that iust man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselues, & no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, & other worthy Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commodity; so the desire which they conceiued of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, & robbing them of the generall loue, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threescore Talents were raised to sixe hundred, nor long after that, ere their couetous tyranny had conuerted their followers into slaues, and extorted from them yearely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delus was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were laid vp, and where, at the generall Assembly, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, vnder their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Eiona, vpon the Riuer Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Carisij, & brought into seruitude the Naxij, contrary to the forme of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements; taking vpon them and vsurping a kinde of soueraigne authority ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the warre in their owne persons, and giuen vp altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in mony, than either in men of warre, or in ships; leauing the prouision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honorable Seruices, at the cost of those, who hauing lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was giuen. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherwith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, took-in the City of Phaselis; which hauing formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieue, or any way assist the Greekes, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sayle for the Riuer Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of sixe hundred sayle, (or according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and hauing a great Land-Armie, encamped vpon the shoare; all which forces hauing beene prouided for aduancing the Kings affaires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere euer they had swom in the Greekish Seas. Cimon hauing in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third. For fourescore sayle of Phenicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, vnder the Persian command) thinking to haue ioyned themselues with the Fleet before destroyed, arriued vpon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they onely sought to run themselues on ground; by which meane preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of preuailing vpon Greece, he condescended to whatsoeuer Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further couenanting, That none of his ships of War should sayle to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidoniæ.

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as vnder Alexander, they ouerthrew the empire of Persia; in which warre, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great cõmand, but serued altogether vnder the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

BEsides these losses, which could not easily haue bin repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue iust cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the vncle of Xerxes, perceiuing, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, began to repose lesse hope of a safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignrie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had been innocent) he accused Darius the son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse he got the Kingdome, and held it seuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him preuented and surprised, were hard to affirme any certainty. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken hee was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreame torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse:

Rarò antecedentem scelestum
Deseruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldome the villaine, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance failes to ouertake.

§. IIII.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; & his death.

Artaxerxes being established in his Kingdome, and hauing so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affaires required, began to conceiue new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessors had euer hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merits in that seruice, that they not onely thought it fit for themselues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preserue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet now presuming vpon his good seruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had receiued from him, that they laide vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten yeeres, as a man ouer-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty Cities, was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himself into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly setled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceiued of aduancing his affaires by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxarxes, and (for ought that I can vnderstand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had giuen, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelinesse of good successe, in leading a great Army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to seeke honour by the ruine of it: sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vndertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulnesse to his well-deseruing Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

WHen was Artaxerxes driuen to vse the seruice of his owne Captaines in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a iust cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth vnder Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, & thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to haue been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proof of the Græcian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greekes could receiue no harme from him) wherof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no smal part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far ouermatching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therfore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues & power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, what soeuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The Ile of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpoſe of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already deuoured, in conceit, this Iland, vvas on the ſodaine vvell-nigh choaked with a greater morſell, to ſnatch at vvhich, they let Cyprus alone, vvhich they might eaſily haue ſwallowed and digeſted. For Inarus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, hauing found how greatly the Country was exhauſted by the late warres, and how vveakely defended by very ſlender Perſian Garriſons, conceiued rightly, that if ſuch ſmall forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the ſodaine of his owne Guards, or leuie out of the ordinary Garriſons, vvere by him defeated; the naturals of the Country, not long ſince oppreſſed by Cambyſes, and after a reuolt very lately ſubdued by Xerxes, would ſoone breake faith vvith him, vvho had no other title to that Kingdome than a good ſword. Further, he perſwaded himſelfe that the people, vnable to defend themſelues againſt the Perſian vvithout his aſſiſtance, would eaſily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for King. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly ſlaine Achamenes the Viceroy; diuers Cities forthwith declared themſelues for him, and proclaiming him King, ſhewed the moſt of their endeuour for proſecution of the warre. But he conſidering his owne weakeneſſe, and that the meanes of the Egyptians his adherents were not anſwerable to their deſires, perceiued well, that to reſiſt the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price ſoeuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarqued; he inuited the Commanders to ſhare with him the kingdome of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than ſuch an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their eſtate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly ſorted according to their expectation) would haue bin contented with an equall ſhare, and not haue fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a diuination vnneceſſary. He vvas poſſeſſed of the peoples loue, they vvere of moſt power. But the iſſue of thoſe affaires vvas ſuch as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they ſhared ſomewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterpriſe very good and hopefull ſucceſſe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it ſelfe they tooke two parts: to the third part, vvhich was called the White wall, they laid ſuch hard ſiege, that neither thoſe forces of the Perſians, vvhich then vvere in Egypt, vvere ſtrong enough to remoue them; neither could Artaxerxes vvell deuiſe what meanes to vſe for the recouery of that which was loſt, or for the preſeruation of the remainder. The beſt of his hope vvas by ſetting the Lacedæmonians vpon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This vvas the firſt time that the Perſian ſought to procure the aſſiſtance of the Greekes one againſt the other, by ſtirring them vp vvith gold to the entertainment of priuate quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpoſe he ſent Megabazus to Sparta vvith much Treaſure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedæmonians vvere nothing forward in imploying their whole force againſt the Athenians, vvhom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithſtanding the abſence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wiſeſt way to imploy the reſt of his mony and meanes to their reliefe, who had now the ſpace of ſixe yeares defended his maſters right in Egypt. Therefore he haſtily diſpatched another of his name, the ſonne of Zopyrus, vvho arriuing in Egypt, vvas firſt encountred by the reuolted people; ouer whom he obtained victory, vvhich made him maſter of the Countrey, whileſt the Athenians lay buſied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a ſtrange ayre, and want of ſupply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: ſure it is, that when Megabazus, hauing reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it ſelfe, whether his former ſucceſſe had amended the courage of the Perſians, or want of neceſſaries made the Athenians inferiour to themſelues, he chaſed them out of Memphis, and purſued them ſo neere, as they were forc't to fortifie themſelues in the Iſle of Proſopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene moneths ſiege, turning away one part of the Riuer by diuers Trenches, aſſaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the ſword, ſaue a few that ſaued themſelues by flight into Lybia; the ſame entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they ſent to the ſuccour of the firſt two hundred.

Proſopites an Iland between the Riuers of Taly & Pharmuiacus, two of the out-letts of Nilus, towards Alexandria.

hundred. For those Athenians hauing heard nothing that their Fleete and Armie vvas consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vnawares among the Phœnician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recouered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This vvas the end of the Athenians sixe yeares vvarre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indiscretion to vndertake many enterprises at once.

Mendesus is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Busiriticus and Diolcos. But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, runneth into the Sea by the Citie Panephysis.

§. V.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

NOtwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their aduantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Ceeryphalia; the other ouer the Æginets, neere vnto Ægina; where they sunke and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Ægina, from vvhence they could not be moued, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to diuert them, inuaded Megara; where, after a great fight, vvith equall losse, the Corinthians, vvhen they returned againe to set vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, vvere vtterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians vvere discomfited neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedemonians, vvho returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at vvhich time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after the Athenians entred Bœotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulfe Oetæus, and euened the wals of Tanagra, to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render vpon most base conditions; as to beat downe the wals of their Citie, and to giue them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they sackt and spoiled many places vpon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians; wan vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These vvere the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six yeares that a part of their forces made warre in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the King Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory ouer those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for fiue yeares, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashueroth the husband of Queene Hester.

THese Egyptian troubles being ended, the reigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; wherof the length is by some restrained into twenty yeares, but the more and better Authors giue him fortie, some allow vnto him foure and forty. He

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleneſſe. His fauour was exceeding great to the Iewes; as appeareth by the Hiſtories of Eſdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needleſſe trauaile; conſidering that all the late Diuines haue taken very much paines, to ſhew that thoſe two Prophets were licenſed by him, and ſuccoured in that building, in ſuch ſort as appeares in their writings.

This was likewiſe that King Ahaſhueroſh who married Heſter. Whereof if it be needfull to giue proofe, it may ſuffice; That Ahaſhueroſh liued in Suſa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore muſt haue bin a Perſian; That he liued in peace, as appeares by the circumſtances of the Hiſtorie, & vſed the counſaile of the ſeuen Princes, the authority of which Princes began vnder Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyſes.

The continuall Warres which exerciſed King Darius the ſonne of Hyſtaſpes, together with the certainty of his marriages with ſundry wiues, from none of whom he vvas diuorced, but left his firſt wife Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, aliue in great honour, ſhe being mother to Xerxes the ſucceeding King; doe manifeſtly prooue that Heſter was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the perſwaſion of Mardocheus, Ioiachim the high Prieſt the ſon of Ieſua, cauſed the feaſt of Purim to be inſtituted in memory of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the reigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Eſdras, and Nehemias: Ieſua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The ſame continuance of warres, vvith other his furious and tragicall loues, wherewith Xerxes did conſume ſuch little time, as he had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the ſtorie of Heſter pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who liued but one and twentie yeares, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahaſuerus or Artaſaſtha is expreſſed by Nehemias. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the ſeuenth yeare of his reigne (wherein this marriage muſt haue bin celebrated) came not neere to Suſa. Of the Princes that ſucceeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahaſhueroſh, it is enough to ſay, that Mardocheus hauing beene carried from Hieruſalem captiue, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was vnlikely to haue liued vntill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he liued in Suſa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiakim the high Prieſt: and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that ſeuenth yeere of his reigne; which good fortune might well giue occaſion to ſuch a Royall feaſt, as is deſcribed in the beginning of Heſter. This is the ſumme of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Heſters ſtorie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, vvho addes the authorities of Ioſephus, affirming the ſame, and of Philo, giuing to Mardocheus eighteene yeares more than Iſaac the Patriarch liued, namely, one hundred foureſcore and eighteene yeares in all, which expire in the fiue and thirtieth yeare of this Artaxerxes, if we ſuppoſe him to haue bin carried away captiue, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponneſian Warre.

BVt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently proſecuting their ciuill warres, ſuffered the Perſians for many ages to reſt in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Lacedemonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, recouered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the ſame, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the baniſhed Bœotians re-entred their owne Land, and maſtred two of their own Townes poſſeſt by the Athenians, which they ſoone recouered againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locrians, (Nations oppreſt by the Athenians) ſet vpon them with ſuch reſolution, as the Athenians vvere in that fight all ſlaine or taken, taken, whereby the Bœotians recouered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa tooke such courage vpon this, that they reuolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aduertised that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedæmonians, & submitted themselues to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slaine the Athenians Garrisons, & ioyned themselues with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, & Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistoanax, the son of Pausanias, had inuaded it, pillaged, & burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intent and recouered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliuer vp all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeares.

After sixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Mylesians against the Samians) inuaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc't to yeelde themselues vpon most lamentable conditions, Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake down their own wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoeuer had beene taken by themselues, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre, whereof I haue gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell; I hold it conuenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens, and Sparta, vpon which all the rest had most dependance.

Chap. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what tearmes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Greece was neuer vnited vnder the gouernement of any one Prince or Estate, vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subiection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeelde obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honour of the victorie, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards reigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder such obedience, as differed little from seruitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, preserue their libertie; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserued best the plague of tyranny, hauing first giuen occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For, vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing euery State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastered all, forasmuch as euery conclusion conclusion of one was afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrie) the warres commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuersies were soone decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Counsell of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedemonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacedemonians had liued about foure hundred yeares vnder one forme of Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre began. Their education was onely to practice feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth, euery one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner as they vsed. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meales being in common Hals, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they liued Vtopian-like, saue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleete was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution. The Lacedemonians very slow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very resolute, & such as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenians did vsually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme & assured, that sought honor & not riches; wheras the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subiection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had inuaded Greece, pretending onely a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the town of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth vpon a Nauie, & (assisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfited by them, & the Greekes, who all serued vnder conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas vnder their obedience; imposing vpon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of war against the Persians; though indeed they imployed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much ielousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breede contention between them & other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would haue oppressed the Plateans, when they of Platea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

NEuertheleſſe many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroached apace vpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and giuen them a great ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Corcyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would haue taken. Now howsoeuer it were so, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto hauing for answer, That they themselues should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they began to deale plainly, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the State of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reuersed. This last point, they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but onely that by seeming to haue obtained somewhat, they might preserue their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparant, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needefull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedæmonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, & hauing the generall fauour; as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subiects; which they held; & afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

THe first and second yeares expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driuen to flye, with Wiues, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citie, such as before they had neuer felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the reuolt of the Mytilenians, in the Ile of Lesbos, & the siege of Platea their confederated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise; besides some small ouerthrowes receiued. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enrer the Countrie of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals began to faile, wasting and destroying all things round about: The Gouernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wan the Towne of Platæa, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre, the Lacedæmonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselues might, and did receiue. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing wel that Athens was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subiect vnto that Estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke but small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mighty Citie, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they began began to ſet their care to build a ſtrong Nauie, wherein they had little good ſucceſſe, being eaſily vanquiſhed by the Athenians, who both had more and better ſhips, and were ſo skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Veſſels of theirs durſt vndertake a great number of the Peloponneſians.

§. IIII.

Of the great loſſe which the Spartans receiued at Pylus.

AMong other loſſes which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they receiued at Pylus a very ſore blow, that compelled them to ſue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ſhips bound for Corcyra, waſting in that paſſage, as their manner was, the coaſt of Laconia, and all the halfe Ile of Peloponneſus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontorie, ioyning to the maine, by a ſtrange necke of Land. Before it there lies a ſmall barren Iland of leſſe than two miles compaſſe, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ſhips, the force of weather being borne off by the head-Land and Iſle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haſte they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was ſupplied by the naturall ſtrength and ſite of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and hauen, they in reaſon expected many aduantages againſt their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Meſſenians, who in ancient times had held very ſtrong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite ſubdued) they were held in ſtreight ſubiection, yet was not the olde hatred ſo extinguiſhed, that by the neere neighbourhood and aſſiſtance of the Athenians, it might not be reuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedæmonians, and as many of their bond-ſlaues as could eſcape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excurſions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying almoſt in the mid-way betweene them and Corcyra, make them able to ſur-round all Peloponneſus, and waſte it at their pleaſure. The newes of theſe doings at Pylus drew the Peloponneſians thither in all haſte out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not onely their Land-forces, but all their Nauie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might prooue in time, they well fore-ſaw, little fearing the grieuous loſſe at hand, which they there in few daies receiued. For when they in vaine made a generall aſſault on all ſides, both by Sea and Land; finding that ſmall Garriſon which the Athenians had left, very reſolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing foure hundred & twenty choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but ſo narrow, that onely two ſhips in front could enter between the Iſle and Pylus; likewiſe but ſeuen or eight ſhips could enter at once by the further channell, between the Iland and the Maine. Hauing thus taken order to ſhut vp this new Towne by Sea, they ſent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other ſtuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and blocke vp the piece on all ſides. But in the meane ſeaſon the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the hauen, did breake and ſinke many of their Enemies veſſels; tooke fiue, and ſo inforced the reſidue to runne themſelues a-ground.

Now was the Towne ſecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as loſt. Wherefore the Magiſtrates were ſent from Sparta to the campe (as was their cuſtome in great dangers) to aduiſe what were beſt for the publike ſafety; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to reſcue their Citizens out of the Iſle, than by compoſition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedæmonians ſhould deliuer vp all the ſhips which were in the coaſt, and that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the town, nor the Athenians againſt the campe: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Fleſh, ſhould be daily carried into the Iſle, but that no ſhips ſhould paſſe into the Iland ſecretly: That the Athenians ſhould carry the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and ſhould bring them backe, at whoſe returne the truce ſhould end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, ſhould be held vtterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they receiued them. The Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselues had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for peace, aduising them to make an end of warre, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euen termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had been taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void: now (said the Athenians) ye haue assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquited of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so far ouer-weighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driuen to vse many hard meanes, for conueiance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next inuaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedæmonians were so farre from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus, which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

Athenians

§. V.

How the Lacedæmonians hardly, and to their great disaduantage, obtained a peace, but was not well kept.

THerefore they indeuoured greatly to obtain peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with continuance of good successe, that hauing sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters receiued, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slaine; which two had most bin aduersaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not onely felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had receiued at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all aduantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reuiue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it onely a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging ouer their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to auoide. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmity with them, was now, after a truce of thirty yeares well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could euer farre preuaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not beene regarded. For it was then thought, that by wasting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not onely the Athenians should haue been brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sake the war was vnder-taken, haue bin so firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they should for loue of them haue abandoned the Argiues, to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, & meanes to raise more, were able to secure themselues by a strong fleet from any great harme that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could doe vnto them; yea as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians were glad to vse the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much adoe they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians should restore first. These had wonne more townes vpon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them, some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends & deliuerers, & not compelled them to breake in as enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands, but had bin rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to giue some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retaine others, which they had gotten in the Warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselues into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding whatsoeuer articles were drawne, and concluded, for their securitie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backeward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, vntill such time as they might receiue the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrel, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more streight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensiue and defensiue with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argiues, who being (as they thought) likely to haue sued for peace at their hands, as soone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselues plainely vnwilling to giue eare to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure worke, the Spartants regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deseruing in the late warre, or found so troublesome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durst let it appeare) was little worse than friendship. It bred great iealousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceiue such a coniunction betweene two so powerfull Signiories: especially one clause threatning euery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebanes, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown vpon the Lacedæmonians their vniust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might haue been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely vsed the aduantage.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessiue, that when by some siniſter accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not onely abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreame) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedæmonian would haue endured to lay down his weapons, & yeeld himselfe prisoner, nor that any misfortune should haue bin so great, as should haue drawn that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to liue in captiuitie, than to die in fight, and that Pylus it selfe, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonorable ease: then did not onely the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities ioyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies vpon the rich & great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to do much, they conceiued a strong beleefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost natural in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should haue discerned only the vertues; and comparing iniuriously our best parts with their worst, are iustly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting in our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuy at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present Warre. But these Corinthians did onely murmure at the peace, alleadging as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of Warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependancy vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselues; feare of reuenge to come, working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argiues feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fil their sailes; prepared themselues to take as much of it as they could stand vnder; giuing for that purpose vnto twelue of their Citizens, a ful & absolute commission to make alliance betweene them & any free Cities of Greece (Athens & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding euery particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to leade the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entred into this new confederacy; some incited by priuate respects, others thinking it the wisest way to do as the most did. What inconuenience might arise vnto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; & therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceiued that the mischiefe had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceiued of their present aduantage ouer Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance, which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselues contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should bind the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no diuine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without prouision prouision of restitution; and that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselues bound both in reason & religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vndertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Hauing dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to ioyne themselues with Argos, & caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta & Athens were in a manner left to themselues, the Thebanes and Megarians being also vpon the point to haue entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were diuers, which caused this hastie confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much diuersitie both of sincerite and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians: as the Mantineans and Eleans: these did firmely betake themselues to the Argiues, in whom they knew the same affection to be inueterate; others did onely hate the peace concluded; and these would rather haue followed the Spartans than the Argiues in war, yet rather the Argiues in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselues, dealt with them to enter into the societie of the Argiues, as they had done: but the different formes of gouernment, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by ioyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse hauing ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethinke themselues of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were vnprepared for warre. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomacke than force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta & her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (vvhich were loth to acknowledge themselues dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into priuate confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre vvithout the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearely be seene the great aduantage vvhich absolute Lords haue, as well in peace as in vvarre, ouer such as are serued by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any Signiorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta vvas by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it selfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsiue meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselues as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giuing vp such places as were agreed vpon: of vvhich the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late vvar, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (vvho earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselues might recouer Pylus) vnlesse that they vvould agree to make a priuate alliance with Thebes; vvhich thereupon they vvere constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians hauing broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselues to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebanes, who did not giue vp the towne of Panacte, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the the Athenians. This was ſought to haue bin excuſed by the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadours, who comming to Athens (vvhither they had ſent home all priſoners that had bin detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to ſalue the matter; ſaying, That from henceforth no enemie to Athens ſhould neſtle in Panacte, for it was deſtroyed. But theſe Embaſſadors had not to deale vvith tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vſed ſuch baſe concluſion as ſtood notwith their honour: hauing made priuate alliance with the Thebanes; hauing deſtroyed a Towne that they ſhould haue reſtored; and not hauing forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Couenants of the late concluded peace. Heereupon they diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors vvith rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger thoſe that ſent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, choſen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though deſiring to renew the warre, yet wiſhed that firſt they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Couenant, eſpecially Pylus that had ſo ſorely troubled them. Alcibiades, vvhoſe Nobilitie, riches, & fauor with the people, made him deſire warre, as the meane vvherby himſelf might procure ſome honourable employment; vſed all meanes to ſet the quarrell on foot, whileſt the Athenians had yet both aduantage enough, as not hauing rendred ought ſaue their priſoners, and pretence enough to vſe that aduantage of breaking the peace, by reaſon that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed againſt their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedæmonians ſhould, and might require, vntill they had firſt, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, euen to the vtmoſt point. This was enough to make them ſweat, who hauing already done the moſt that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliuery of their Citizens, vvhich vvere priſoners. But Alcibiades vviſhing a ſpeedy beginning of open vvarre, ſent priuily to the Argiues, and gaue them to vnderſtand how fitly the time ſerued for them to aſſociate themſelues with Athens, vvhich was enough to giue them ſecuritie againſt all Enemies.

The Argiues vpon the firſt confluence of many Eſtates vnto their ſocietie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they ſhould haue had the conduct of all Greece againſt the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as hauing ill vſed it, and thereby leauing their old enemies in caſe of much contempt and diſabilitie. But theſe ſuddain apprehenſions of vaine ioy, were ſuddainly changed into as vaine feare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bin conceiued of Argos. For when the Thebans had refuſed their alliance; when the Corinthians had ſought ſecuritie from Athens; and when a falſe rumour was noyſed abroad, Athens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then began the Argiues to let fall their creſts, and ſue for peace vnto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not ouer-haſtie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the meſſage of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argiues, which were not now conſulting how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to ſaue themſelues. Wherefore they ſent away preſently to Athens, their owne Embaſſadours, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offenſiue, and defenſiue, betweene their Eſtates and the Athenians.

Of this buſineſſe the Lacedæmonians knew not what to thinke: for well they ſaw, that ſuch a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were deſirous to preuent it; but to keepe the loue of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was alreadie done, than ſtood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wiſeſt way, hauing done ſo much, not to ſticke vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full ſatisfaction, to retaine the friendſhip of that State, which was more to be valued than all the reſt of Greece. This reſolution preuailing, they ſent away ſuch of their Citizens as were beſt affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commiſſion to make an end of all controuerſies, did earneſtly labour in the Councell-houſe, to make the truth of things appeare, ſaying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recouery of Panacte: concerning which Towne, or any other buſineſſe, that it much grieued ued the Lacedæmonians, to see things full out in such wise as might giue to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters euen between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselues had absolute commission. Wherfore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argiues might be called aside. Fauourable audience was giuen to this proposition, the rather, because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their city, & aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communalty of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptory & yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleeued him, & fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as he had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the aduantage, which their double dealing afforded, inueighed openly against them, as men of no sincerity, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselues with friends, meaning to draw the Argiues & their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrary to their owne Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly haue satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill been seconded with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the businesse was put off, vntill he himselfe, with other Embassadours, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might haue cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders, by discouering the truth: But the grauity which was vsually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well haue beene thought vntruly men, had they professed themselues such as would say and vn-say for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sowre message to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the paines to rebuild Panacte, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacy with the Argiues, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to haue effected nothing) sweare a-new to keepe the Articles of the league betweene him and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argiues, Mantinæans, & Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfe chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who hauing restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues recouered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundry passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amity, they had left sundry of their old friends to shift for themselues. Contrariwise, the Athenians, by the treaty of peace, had recouered the most part of that which they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained; and were ſtrengthened by the acceſſe of new Confederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argiues and their fellowes had found buſineſſe wherwith to ſet the Athenians on worke, and make vſe of this coniunction. For, preſuming vpon the ſtrength of their ſide, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hoſtility were committed, wherin Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infeſt each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their ſeuerall friends.

By theſe occaſions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, & other people of Greece, began a-new to range themſelues vnder the Lacedæmonians, & follow their enſignes. One victory which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer valour in a ſet battell, neer to Mantinæa, againſt the Argiue-ſide, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwiſe it yeelded them no great profit. The ciuill diſſenſion ariſing ſhortly after within Argos it ſelfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almoſt throwne downe the whole frame of the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded ſo farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expreſſe words, and forced the Mantinæans to the like. But in ſhort ſpace of time the multitude preuailing, reuerſed all this, and hauing chaſed away their ambitious Nobility, applied themſelues to the Athenians as cloſely as before.

Beſide theſe vprores in Peloponneſus, many aſſaies were made to raiſe vp troubles in all parts of Greece, & likewiſe in Macedon, to the Athenians; whoſe forces & readines for execution, preuented ſome things, reuenged other, and requited all with ſome proſperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; & the Lacedæmonians growing weary, they began to be quiet; retaining ſtill that enmity in their hearts, which they had ſufficiently diſcouered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open Warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians ſending two Fleets to ſacke Siracuſe, are put to flight, and vtterly diſcomfited.

DVring this intermiſſion of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of ſubduing Sicil, whither they ſent a Fleet ſo mighty as neuer was ſet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, & furniſhed with all neceſſaries to ſo great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driuen to baniſh himſelfe, for feare of ſuch iudgement, as elſe he was like to haue vndergone, among the incenſed people; partly by the inuaſion which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Attica, whileſt the forces of that State were ſo far from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponneſians with mony.

Neither was the ſucceſſe of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without help from Athens, could giue any likelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the beginning, the enterpriſe had ſo well ſucceeded, that they beſieged Siracuſe, the chiefe City of all the Iland, and one of the faireſt Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtayning the better in ſundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieued with ſtrong aide from Peloponneſus, it came to paſſe that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe that their Fleet was ſhut vp into the hauen of Siracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very il in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand vpon hard terms, for that the Lacedæmonians, who had beene formerly accuſtomed to make wearieſome yearly iourneies into Attica, which hauing pilled & forraged, they returned home; did now now by counsell of Alcibiades, (who seeking reuenge vpon his owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Town of Decelea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes giue alarme vnto the City it selfe. In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange; who leauing at their backes, and at their owne doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselues, did yet send forth another Fleet into Sicil, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which had neuer offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous euent makes foolish counsaile seem wiser than it was; which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was said to turne vnto the best. But where vnsound aduice, finding bad proofe, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be iustly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might haue serued to conuey home the former that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nauie, which was there before) quite vanquished, & bard vp into the hauen of Siracuse, wherby the camp of the Athenians, vtterly depriued of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driuen to breake vp, and flye away by Land; in which flight they were ouer-taken, routed, and quite ouerthrowne, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe wel deserued fell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pthiodorus Generalls, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicil, wheras indeed there was not any means or possibility to haue made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chiefe command in this vnhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazzard the ruine of his Country by the losse of that Army, wherin consisted little lesse than all the power of Athens; than to aduenture his owne estate, his life, and his honour vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Iudges before his triall resolued to condemne him, by retiring from Siracuse, when wisdome and necessity required it. For (said hee) they shal giue sentence vpon vs, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would giue eare to any that would speake in our behalfe, but altogether harken to suspicious and vaine rumors that shall be brought against vs; yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; & to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report & censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eies the iniustice of his people, and had well vnderstood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne wherby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily haue ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, hauing no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to haue the camp break vp till seuen and twenty daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not haue thought that the power of the Heauens, & the course of Nature, would be as vniust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse euill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can alleage this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Cæsar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, hee retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was aduised, vpon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answer that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule, Sapiens dominabitur astris.

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily workes by a concatenation of meanes, depriues the Gouernours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vniust men is the ready meane to weaken the vertue of those who might haue done them good.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Army, in Sicilia.

THe losse of this Army was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompted a very little lesse calamity to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the City about seuen yeares after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subiects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced vnder their obedience, others held out; some for feare of greater inconuenience were set at liberty, promising onely to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subiects; others hauing a kinde of liberty offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect liberty by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnseasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolency, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the gouernment into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set vp the forme of an Aristocratie in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this innouation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonalty were so dismaid, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but euery man was affraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall fear the Maiesty of Athens was vsurped by foure hundred men, who obseruing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely such as were first allowed in priuate among themselues; neither had the Commonalty any other liberty, than onely to approue and giue consent: for whosoeuer presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquiry made of the murther. By these meanes were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new Authority, which neuertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Army which then was in the Isle of Samos, did altogether detest these dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they reuoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedæmonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first beene very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his seruice done vnto that State was not growne to be the obiect of enuie. But when it appeared that in Counsaile & good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedæmonians, that all their good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens weary of his vertue, especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeelded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbeare to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouering the Spartan treachery, conueighed himself vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beauty, sweet conuersation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-royes affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to aduise Tissaphernes not so far forth to assist the Lacedæmonians, that they should quite ouerthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the onely Fauourite of so great a Potentate) he played his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Army, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) he laboured greatly to reconreconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernours; or at leaſt to diuert their heat another way, and turne it vpon the common Enemy. Some of the foure hundred approued his motion, as being weary of the tyranny wherof they were partakers, partly becauſe they ſaw it could not long endure; and partly for that themſelues, being leſſe regarded by the reſt of their companions, than ſtood with their good liking, ſought to acquit themſelues of it as honeſtly as they might. But the moſt of that Faction laboured to obtaine peace of the Lacedæmonians, deſiring chiefly to maintain both their own authority & the greatneſſe of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wiſh to preſerue their owne power, or ſafety at leaſt, than the good Eſtate of the Common-wealth. Therfore they made ſundry ouertures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, deſiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be truſted than the wauering multitude; eſpecially conſidering that the City of Sparta was gouerned by an Ariſtocratie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All theſe paſſages betweene the foure hundred (or the moſt and chiefe of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as ſecret as might be. For the city of Athens, hoping, without any great cauſe, to repaire their loſſes, was not inclined to make compoſition, from which vpon iuſter ground the Enemy was much more auerſe, truſting well that the diſcord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld ſome faire opportunity to the deſtruction of it ſelfe, which in effect (though not then preſently) came to paſſe. And vpon this hope king Agis did ſometimes bring his Forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he receiued ſome ſinall loſſes. Likewiſe the Nauie of Peloponneſus made ſhew of attempting the City, but ſeeing no likelihood of ſucceſſe, they bent their courſe from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly haue bin regarded, than in this their decayed eſtate. Yet it ſeemes, without any diſparagement to their wiſedome, they ſhould rather haue forborne to preſent vnto the City, or to the Countries neere adioyning, any terrour of the warre. For the diſſenſion within the walls might ſoon haue done more good than could be receiued from the Fleet or Army without, which indeed gaue occaſion to ſet the Citizens at vnity, though it laſted not very long. The foure hundred, by meanes of theſe troubles, were faine to reſigne their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people hauing taken armes to repell forraigne Enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themſelues from ſuch as oppreſſed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernment a full reſtitution of the ſoueraign command vnto the people, or whole body of the City, but only to fiue thouſand; which company the foure hundred (when their authority began) had pretended to take vnto them as aſſiſtants: herein ſeeming to do little wrong or none to the Commonalty, who ſeldome aſſembled in greater number. But now when the higheſt power was come indeed into the hands of ſo many, it was ſoon agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions ſhould be recalled from exile, and that the Army at Samos ſhould be requeſted to vndertake the gouernment: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers deſire.

How Alcibiades wonne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe depoſed.

THis eſtabliſhment of things in the City, was accompanied with ſome good ſucceſſe in the Warres. For the Lacedæmonians were about the ſame time ouerthrown at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards ioyning ſuch forces as he could raiſe, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydus, his arriuall with eighteen ſhips, gaue the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and vtterly deſtroyed the fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ranſome their City, & fortified Chryſopolis. Hereupon letters were ſent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to containe the diſtreſſe of the Army, in theſe few words: All is loſt; Mindarus is ſlaine; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades ouerthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, beſieged & won Byzantium, now called Conſtantinople, wᵗʰ euen in in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driuen to banish himselfe againe; onely because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they receiued, was (though more heauie to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued vpon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought reuenge vpon his owne City; now, as inured to aduersity, he rather pittied their fury, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should haue repaired their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamity of his people, to comfort himselfe after iniury receiued. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arriued at the Fleet, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victory, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, & better ordered than they had bin vnder his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

§. II.

The battaile at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiuing many losses and discomfitures, were driuen to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were streightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessels, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicratidas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserued his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well haue beene expected, that the ten Captaines, who ioyntly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies seruice, and so happy a victory, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forthwith called home, & accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken & sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might haue saued them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very iust answer, That they pursuing the victory, had left part of the fleet, vnder sufficient men, to saue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse auailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had been intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people reuenge of their deaths vpon the Captaines. It was very strange, that vpon such an accusation maintained with so slender euidence, men that had well deserued of their Country should be ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, saue onely Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this iudgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieued by other vessels in the storme: but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the fury of the people was ouer-past, this iudgement was reuersed, and the accusers called into question for hauing deceiued and peruerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselues from the infamy of iniustice; but the diuine Iustice was not a-sleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

The battaile at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe Peloponnesian fleet vnder Lysander, the year next following, hauing scowred the Ægean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged & took the town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the nauie of Athens, being an hundred & fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their comming, they put in at Sestos, where hauing refreshed themselues, they sailed to the riuer called, Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the riuer of the Goat; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbor. The next day after their arriual they presented fight vnto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, wherupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos, & thus they continued fiue daies, brauing euery day the Enemy, & returning to their own harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Nauie, & his power in those places was such as might haue greatly auailed his Countrimen, if they could haue made vse of it. For he had waged Mercenaries, & making war in his own name vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, & obtained much reputation among them. He perceiuing the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, & shewed what great inconuenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see & preuent it. For they lay in a roade subiect to euery weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselues with necessaries, nor so farre off as had been more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Marriners resorted, flocking away from the Nauie euery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not farre off, or at least to consider how neere their Enemy was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to their General, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, & to remember that his authority was out of date. Had it not bin for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) haue compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight vpon vnequall terms, or vtterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so haue done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Streights, who assaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leaue their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath bin rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how euill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lysander all this while defending himselfe by the aduantage of his Hauen, was not careless in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his maner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who obseruing their doings, related vnto him what they had seene. Therefore vnderstanding in what careless fashion they romed vp & down the Country; he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, & the fift day gaue especiall charge to his Scouts, That when they perceiued the Athenians, disimbarking, as their custome was, & walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lysander being in a readinesse, made all speed that strength of Oares could giue, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies a-boord their ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion vpon the news of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industry which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that loss imported, gaue ouer Athens as desperate, & made a long flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, & such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seuen and twenty years, with variable successe concluded in one houre, & the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately vpon this victory Lysander, hauing taken such Townes as readily did yeeld yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set saile for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agis & Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City; which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth againe to Sea, & rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Towns of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselues to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all prouision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the citie, & inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long wals, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be throwne downe; That all Cities subiect to their Estate, should be set at liberty; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adioyning to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelue Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the Wars.

These Articles being agreed vpon, the wals were throwne down with great reioycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; & not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Gouernors, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolency and iniustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slauery,

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirty Tyrants perceiuing this, aduertised the Lacedæmonians therof, who contriued, and (as now domineering in euery quarter) soon effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therin they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, & by Combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they took was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, vnder whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the City of Sparta (besides other great losses receiued) was sundry times in danger of being taken. But these haughty attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the seuerall Estates & Signories of Greece, were grown so iealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argiues, & Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselues with the weaker party, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her iurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her Neighbors. And thus all parts of the country remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had bin dependants, & followers, yea almost meere Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into seruitude, from which they neuer could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of liberty, did themselues indeed become their Masters.

Chap. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in these times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, hauing peaceably enioyed a long reigne ouer the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing ouer Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short reigne little to be regarded) place next vnto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to haue beene the the ſons of Heſter) held the Kingdome but one yeare betweene them, the younger ſucceeding his elder brother. It is not my purpoſe (as I haue ſaid before) to purſue the Hiſtory of the Perſians from henceforth. by rehearſall of all the particulars, otherwiſe than as they ſhall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore ſuffice to ſay, That Xerxes the ſecond, being a vicious Prince, did periſh after a moneth or two, if not by ſurfeit, then by the treachery of his riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewiſe of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he ſlew vniuſtly Bagoazus a principall Eunuch, & would haue done as much to his brother Darius the Baſtard, had not he foreſeene it, and by raiſing a ſtronger Army than this hated King Sogdianus could leuie, ſeized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius hauing ſlaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeares. Amyrtæus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled againſt him, and hauing partly ſlain, partly chaſed out of the Land the Perſian Garriſons, allied himſelfe ſo firmely with the Greeks, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his poſterity, who (notwithſtanding the fury of their ciuill Warres) maintained it againſt the Perſian, all the dayes of this Darius, and of his ſon Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewiſe Amorges, a Subiect of his owne and of the Royall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled againſt him; confederating himſelfe with the Athenians. But the great calamity, before ſpoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, hauing put new life into the Spartans, and giuen courage to the Ilanders & others, ſubiect to the State of Athens, to ſhake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being deſtitute of mony, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was impoſſible to aduance the war againſt the ſtate of Athens, that remained powerfull by ſea, were driuen to craue his aſſiſtance, which he granted vnto them, firſt vpon what conditions beſt pleaſed himſelfe, though afterwards the Articles of the league betweene him and them were ſet downe in more preciſe tearmes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they ſhould make warre ioyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that ſhould rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Aſia, which had formerly beene his, or his Predeceſſours, ſhould returne to his obedience. By this Treaty, and the war enſuing (of which I haue already ſpoken) he recouered all that his Grand-father and Father had loſt in Aſia. Likewiſe by aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians, hee got Amorges a-liue into his hands; who was taken in the City of Iaſus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to ſuccour him. Neuertheleſſe Egypt ſtill held out againſt him; the cauſe wherof cannot be the emploiment of the Perſian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occaſions, but they wanted manhood, which cauſed him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, & his naturall enemies, what the valour of his own Subiects was inſufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Paryſatis his owne ſiſter, who bare vnto him (beſides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to ſay, the Mindefull, or the Rememberer, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdome; & Cyrus the younger, a Prince of ſingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the moſt excellent man that euer Perſia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leaue vnto his elder ſonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did caſt a iealous eye vpon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Aſia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subiect: for which cauſe his father ſent for him, with intent to haue taken ſome very ſharpe courſe with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his younger ſonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene theſe brethren, and ſummarily of Artaxerxes, we ſhall haue occaſion to ſpeake ſomewhat in more conuenient place.

§. II.

How the thirty Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very conuenient to ſhew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the ſubuerſion of the wals of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponneſian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Country of Greece from ciuill broiles. The thirty Gouernours, commonly called the thirty Tyrants of Athens, were choſen at the firſt by the people to compile a body of their Law, & make a collection of ſuch ſuch ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the City ſtanding as it did in that ſo ſodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the ſupreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or becauſe the neceſſity of the times did ſo require it, wherin the Law being vncertain, it was fit that ſuch men ſhould giue iudgement in particular cauſes, to whoſe iudgement the Lawes themſelues, by which the City was to be ordered, were become ſubiect. But theſe thirty, hauing ſo great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deſerue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in truſt.

Therefore apprehending ſuch troubleſome fellowes, as were odious to the City, though not puniſhable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who conſidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themſelues, how eaſie a thing it would be vnto theſe thirty men, to take away the liues of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elſe they liſted, when condemnation without true triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plauſibly entred into a wicked courſe of gouernment, they thought it beſt to fortifie themſelues with a ſure guard, ere they brake out into thoſe diſorders, which they muſt needes commit for the eſtabliſhing of their authority. Wherefore diſpatching two of their own company to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirty, to keep the City free from all rebellious motions: to which purpoſe it behooued them to cut off ſuch as were ſeditious; and therfore deſired the Lacedæmonians to ſend them a Garriſon, which they promiſed at their own coſt to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a Guard ſent, the Captaine of which was ſo well entertained by the thirty, that none of their miſdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after baſe and deteſted perſons, inuaded the principall men of the City, ſending armed men from Houſe to Houſe, who drew out ſuch as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head againſt this wicked forme of gouernment: whereby there was ſuch effuſion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirty) ſeemed very horrible, and vnable to eſcape vengeance. His diſlike of their proceedings being openly diſcouered, cauſed his fellowes to bethink themſelues, and prouide for their own ſecurity, and his deſtruction, leſt he ſhould make himſelfe a Captaine of the diſcontented (which were almoſt the whole City) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they ſelected three thouſand of the Citizens, whom they thought meeteſt, and gaue vnto them ſome part of publike authority, the reſt they diſarmed; and hauing thus increaſed their owne ſtrength, and weakened their oppoſites, they began a-freſh to ſhead the bloud, not onely of their priuate enemies, but of ſuch whoſe mony, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpoſe they concluded, that euery one of them ſhould name one man, vpon whoſe goods he ſhould ſeize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his deteſtation of ſo wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirty was moſt tyrannicall, accuſe him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (wheras one maine priuiledge of the three thouſand was, that none of them ſhould ſuffer death at the appointment of the thirty, but haue the accuſtomed trial) he took vpon him to ſtrike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and ſo reduced him vnder the triall and ſentence of that order. It was well alleadged by Theramenes, that his name was not more eaſie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans; vpon which conſideration, he aduiſed them all to conceiue no otherwiſe of his caſe, than as of their owne, who were liable to the ſame forme of proceeding: but euery man chooſing rather to preſerue his owne life by ſilence, than preſently to draw vpon himſelfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neer him; the Tyrants interpreting ſilence as conſent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poyſon.

§. III.

The conſpiracy againſt the thirty Tyrants, and their depoſing.

AFter the death of Theramenes, the thirty began to vſe ſuch outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For, hauing three thouſand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feare or ſhame, deſpoiling them of lands and and goods, & caused them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their liues. This flight of the Citizens procured their liberty, & the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, & resolued to hazzard their liues in setting free the City of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had bin treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seuenty men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasybulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territory of Athens. No sooner did the thirty heare of their exploit, than seek meanes to preuent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedæmonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormy weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the City, which aboue all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to weary out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were encreased from seuenty to seuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred and twenty. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirty had resolued to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an easie retrait, and saue themselues from any sudden perill. It may well seeme strange, that whereas their barbarous maner of gouernment had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselues of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, & wickedly (though vnder forme of Iustice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutam per scelera est iter, the mischiefes which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of safety, than by extending their cruelty vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were tearmed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, & brought to assault it; but in this enterprise Thrasybulus had the better, & repelled his enemies, of whom although there were slain to the number of seuenty only, yet the victory seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, & the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirty were deposed. Neuertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who hauing communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet form of gouernment could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craning aide against Thrasybulus, & his followers, had fauourable audience, & a power sent to their assistance, both by Land & Sea, vnder the conduct of Lysander, & his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Army of the Cities confederate with the Lacedæmonians. And here appeared first the iealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had bin the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition, alleaging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedæmonians should annexe the Territory of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therfore hauing in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such means, that al things were compounded quietly: the thirty men, & such others, as were like to giue cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, hauing withdrawn themselues to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innouation; wherupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were comming to Parlie, and slew them: which done, to auoid further inconuenience, a law was made, that all iniuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully obserued, the City returned to her former quietnesse.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THE matters of Greece standing vpon such termes, that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, brother to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, hauing in his fathers life time very carefully prosecuted the Warre against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their loue might appeare no lesse to him, than that which hee had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedæmonians gaue a suitable answer, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all seruice that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discouered himselfe, & the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should haue been the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subuersion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greeks the wayes, which vnder the Macedonian Ensignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posterity should measure; & opening vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that Conquest, which he reserued to another generation; than to giue into their hands that mighty Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The loue which Paryſatis the Queen-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest fauour of the people, & ready desires of many principall men, had moued this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bin shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose disfauour himselfe might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the lesse, & hardly be able to maintaine his owne life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tiſſaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, & all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vsing by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might wel be thought, that Queene Paryſatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Paryſatis had vsed the best of her endeauour to that purpose, alleadging that (which in former ages had bin much auaileable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilest his father was a priuate man, but Cyrus, when he was a crowned King. All which not sufficing; when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adioyning: then did this Tiſſaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleeued, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreaty of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent backe into his owne Prouince.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entry into the Warre.

THE forme of gouernment which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their seuerall Prouinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made War and Peace, as they thought it meet, not onely for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their owne heads were held onely at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his wil, whatsoeuer it were, or they could coniecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being setled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother liued, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his own Prouince, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple, being truely paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, vvas well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in priuate quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardize despised, although he durst not aduenture to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesians were about to giue vp themselues into the hands of that young Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserue his reputation, and keepe the towne in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, vvhich vvas no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he tooke not only the men of his own Prouince, or of the Countries adioyning, whose liues were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captaines with money, who being very good men of war, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, til which time they had secret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus hauing sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his assistance, being thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very easily haue forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of all the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imployed in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subiect to the Persian, had inuaded his Territorie, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leauing Tissaphernes much amazed, vvho had no leisure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was neuer leuied against the Rouers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of fiue hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus tooke his iourney into the higher Asia, and came vp close to his Brother.

THe tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hasted vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, hauing his number much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though most strengthned by the accesse of seuen hundred Greeks, & of other foure hundred of the same Nation, who reuolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Caria, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia, where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a brauery, fled a maine, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a ioyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more vnlikely to make resistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will & dispositions, vvhereas his Armie vvas drawne along by meere affection and good will. Neuertheless he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the Riuer of Euphrates. For the very length of the vvay vvhich they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious returne. Therfore he vvas driuen, being yet in Cilicia, to seeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captaines, & his own great enemy, lay by the Riuer, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such deuices, and excessiue promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; vvhere some of the Greekes considering, That who so passed the Riuer first, should haue the most thankes, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, vvherby vvere all finally perswaded to do as some had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they resolued to seeke out Artaxerxes, vvheresoeuer he vvas to be found. The King in the meane time hauing raised an armie of nine hundred thousand men, vvas not so confident vpon this huge multitude, as to aduenture them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had vnder-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, vvhich vvere very narrow, and fortified with a strong vvall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the kings forces, not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any vvay by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian fleet, by the benefit vvhereof to haue transported his Armie. I do not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, vvho arriued not at the Campe, till fiue dayes vvere past after the battaile, receiued either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward vvhom he vvith-drew himselfe, vvere all made of the same mettall.

Therfore Artaxerxes vvas vpon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of his kingdome, vntill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he vvas perswaded not to abandon so many goodly Prouinces to the Enemy, vvho vvould therby haue gathered addition of strength, and (vvhich in the sharpe disputation of Tittle to a kingdome is most auaileable) would haue grown superior in reputation. By such aduice, the king resolued vpon meeting with his brother, who now began to be secure, being fully perswaded that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field: For the king hauing cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eighteene foot deepe, intended there to haue encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

§. IIII.

The battaile betweene Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THe Armie of Cyrus hauing ouercome many difficulties of euill vvayes, and scarcitie of victuals, vvas much encouraged by perceiuing this great feare of Artaxerxes; and being past this trench, marched carelesly in great disorder, hauing bestowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beasts of carriage; vvhen on the sudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselues, & had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the Riuer Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after-noone. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feete of that huge multitude, which the king drew after him, and perceiued by their neere approach how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly in silence, whereas it had bin expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should haue spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the middest of his own, did not with the corner, and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it selfe, vpon such excessiue oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should be so easily chased. Neuertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, hauing learned (contrary to their custome) to giue charge vpon their their enemies with silence, had not learned for it was contrary to their nature to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had bin assured vnto him than, had he not sought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him voide, was about to encompasse the Greekes, and to set vpon them in the reare, he assailed with sixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a squadron of six thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captaine thereof Ariæus, with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of sixe hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leauing Cyrus vnattended, who perceiuing where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to follow or leaue the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I see the man: and presently with a small handfull of men about him ran vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing giuen this stroake, which was his last, he receiued immediatly the fatall blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a base fellow, whereuppon astonied, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was vnpossible to haue recouered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their own liues, when once they perceiued that Cyrus their Master was slaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and vtterly dismaied such Persian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Artaxerxes making all speede, arriued quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who hauing made way through the battaile of the Greeks, was ready now to ioyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bin sufficient to counteruaile all disasters receiued, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks would haue yeelded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slaine any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwise, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field gaue chase to all that came in their sight, they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in the reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approach, turned their faces and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a braucry, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seeme to haue slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to giue reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserue well enough, shewing a manly looke halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he aduanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might haue encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide to beere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouering their approach, fled vpon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, saue onely the Greekes, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was inough for them, hauing that day done enough, to returne to their quarter and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had giuen them no leisure to dine.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the fight, and how Artaxerxes in vaine sought to haue made them yeelde vnto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serue for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Campe, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enioy the pleasure of his good fortune present, because he perceiued that the baseneſſe of his people, & weakeneſſe of his Empire, was now plainely discouered to the Greekes: which gaue him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shameful demeanor of his Armie, should liue to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Monarchy. Wherefore he resolued to try all meanes, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seene: to which purpose he sent them a braue message the next morning, Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gates, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to haue found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceiued in that thought. For the Greekes being aduertised the morning from Arieus, a principall Commander vnder Cyrus, that his Maister being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, waiting for them so long if they would ioyne with him, but resoluing to stay no longer: they sent answer backe to Arieus, that hauing beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arieus himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would ioyne with them and pursue the victory. Before they receiued any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arriued at the Campe, whose errand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them that it was not for the Vanquishers to yeelde their Weapons, another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion, a third asked, whether the king, as hauing the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them: or, whether he desired them in way of friendship, for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to require their kindneſſe. To this question Phalinus a Grecian, waiting vpon Tissaphernes, answered, That the king hauing slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middest whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Riuers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold vp their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselues to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus that hauing nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would be seruiceable; but should they yeelde them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying, This young man did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech, but that hir deceipt speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes and Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus, being a Courtier, and imployed in a businesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a States-man, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish disputer. But his wisedome herein failed him. For whatsoeuer he himselfe was (of whom no more is knowne, than that he brought an vnhonest message to his own Countriuen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Liues, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treachery of the Persians, being a priuate Gentleman, and hauing neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers, than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their their seruice in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might haue vse of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the king good as Friends, nor defend themselues from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing War if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I vnderstand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace; quoth this politique Embassadour? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greekes were faine to feed vpon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

§. VI.

How the Greekes began to returne homewards.

AT night they tooke their way towards Arieus, to whom they came at mid-night; being forsaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I do not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they bin kindly vsed, it may well be thought that some of them should haue accompanied Tissaphernes, and serued as Stales to draw in the rest. Arieus being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke vpon seeking the kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might haue giuen it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall assistance vnto the last: Whereunto both parts hauing sworne, he aduised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieue them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, hauing made a wearisome march, & tyred the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselues to haue encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and giue place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Grecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an vnknown Country, should be very fearefull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to do, should make the Persians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free accesse for Embassadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars do best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run ouer the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the dignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieue them.

How Tissaphernes, vnder colour of peace, betraied all the Captaines of the Greekes.

HItherto the Greekes, relying vpon their own vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselues into any straights or tearmes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Foxe Tissaphernes, who circumuenting the Chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischieuously entrappe them, to the extreame danger of the Armie. He told them, that his Prouince, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement, knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not be vnthankefull for such a benefit. Herewithall he forgot not to rehearse the great ſeruice that he had done to his Maſter, being the firſt that aduertiſed him of Cyrus his intent, and hauing not onely brought him a good ſtrength of men, but in the day of battaile ſhewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backes: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chaſe to the Barbarians that ſtood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I alleadge to the King, entreating that he would giue me leaue to conduct you ſafe into Greece; in which ſuite I haue good hope to ſpeede, if you will ſend a milde anſwer to him, vvho hath vvilled me to aske you, for what cauſe ye haue borne Armes againſt him. The Captaines hearing this, vvere contented to giue gentle words, which Tiſſaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he ſaid) that peace ſhould be granted: the conditions wherof were; That they ſhould paſſe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they tooke, and committing no ſpoile: yet that it ſhould be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refuſed to affoord them an open Market. Hereupon both parties hauing ſworne, the League was concluded, and Tiſſaphernes returning to the king to take leaue, and end all buſineſſe, came vnto them againe after twenty dayes, and then they ſet forward. This interim of twenty dayes, vvhich Tiſſaphernes did ſpend at the Court, miniſtred great occaſion of miſtruſt to his new Confederates. For beſides his long abſence, vvhich alone ſufficed to breede doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Perſians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them ſo with aſſurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more ſtrange to the Greekes, than formerly he had bin. This cauſed many to aduiſe Clearchus, rather to paſſe forward as well as he might, than to relye vpon couenants, and ſit ſtill whileſt the king layed ſnares to entrappe them. But he on the contrary perſwaded them, to reſt contented whileſt they were well, and not to caſt themſelues againe into thoſe difficulties, out of which they vvere newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the kings meanes, but eſpecially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, vvherewith he ſaw no reaſon why the enemie ſhould haue clogged himſelf if he meant miſchiefe, hauing power enough to do them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tiſſaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatneſſe and place in Court) which cauſed his Oath to be the more eſteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or baſe reſpect, was like to haue drawne it from him. But his falſhood vvas ſuch, both in ſubſtance and in ſucceſſe, as may fitly expound that ſaying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lye may finde excuſe when it growes out of feare: for that paſſion hath his originall from weakeneſſe. But when Power, vvhich is a Character of the Almighty, ſhall be made the ſupporter of vntruth, the falſhood is moſt abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, aduancing his own ſtrength againſt the diuine Iuſtice, doth commit that ſinne with an high hand, vvhich commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with ſure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiſſaphernes found means to deſtroy all the Captaines, whom he ſubtilly got into his power by a traine, making the Generall Clearchus himſelfe the meane to draw in all the reſt. The buſineſſe was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed ſome dayes together in ſuch wiſe, that the Perſians did not encampe with the Greekes, vvho vvere very iealous of the great familiarity, appearing betweene Tiſſaphernes, and Arieus; Clearchus thought it conuenient to roote out of Tiſſaphernes his braines all cauſes of diſtruſt, whereof many had grown in that ſhort time. To which purpoſe obtaining priuate conference with him, he rehearſed the oath of Confederacie, which had paſt between them, ſhewing how religiouſly he would keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receiue by the helpe of Tiſſaphernes, he promiſed that their loue ſhould appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he vvould make vſe of their ſeruice againſt the Myſians or Piſidians, who were accuſtomed to infeſt his Prouince; or againſt the Egyptians, vvho were then Rebels to the great King. For which cauſe he deſired him, that whereas all diuine and humane reſpects had linked them together, he would not giue place to any cloſe accuſation or ſuſpition, wherby might grow ſudden inconuenience to either of them, vpon no iuſt ground. The faithleſſe Perſian was very much delighted with this ſpeech, which miniſtred faire occaſion to the execution of his purpoſe. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him wiſely conſidered, wiſhing him further to call to minde how many waies he could haue vſed to bring them to confuſion, without peril to himſelf, eſpecially by by burning the country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs haue perished by meere famine. For which cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seeke by periurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissension between them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceiued, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the Campe of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had bin to some common Faire. But being there arriued, Clearchus with other the fiue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was giuen, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slaine. Forth-with certaine bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, wherof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had bin done. Hereupon the Greekes tooke Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith haue assailed their Campe. Anon they might perceiue the Embassadours of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Arians, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arians deliuered to this effect: That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was iustly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the fiue Coronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honored: and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as hauing belonged vnto his seruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadours, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that he was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send backe Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therfore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, & the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward receiued. He saw his Prouince wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiuing from his Master conuenient aid of men and mony, he did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor periurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailed him; finally, the king was iealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the seruice which he could not do, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; & so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherin he triumphed without great cause, hauing betrayed brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiefe vpon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greekes, and in despight of Tessaphernes went off safely.

GReat was the heauinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their feare of the euill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not well how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe sadnesse of the whole Armie to be such as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, began to aduise the vndervnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethinke themselues of some meane, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoeuer might serue for to giue them hope, and aboue all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment, and so together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain or taken. This being done, and order set downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselues for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than he had bin wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Riuers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they receiued by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy, and finding some Horses fit for seruice, that were imployed among the carriages, he set men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had bin accustomed to the point blanke. By these meanes did he beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gaue them chase with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with troopes of the light-armed-shot & slingers, compelled the enemie to lie aloof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handie-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of aduantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Country. With great sorrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some aduised to defend the Country, as granted by the enemie himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to do that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing ouer some high mountaines which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not haue availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties, which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselues against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and vsed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much vse against these poore trauellers, afflicting them in seuen daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great Riuer, vpon which the Greekes refreshed themselues one day, reioycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leuied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies hauing taken their way towards Ionia. The Riuer was broad and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subiects of the Persian, who (hauing but a few of the most dispeditmen) gaue succour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being light armed, could not on plaine ground make resistance. These Carduchi seeme to haue inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are continuate from the Spring of Tygris, though Ptolomie place them far more to the East beyond the Riuer of Cyrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserue credit. Of the Riuer Centrites, and many other Riuers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon, yet vnknowne about to make a conjecture, which may endure the seuerity of a Critike. Neither Ptolomie, nor the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition. The truth of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much aboue the first spring and head of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Tardeus in Gordyene, a Prouince of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes hauing pitched their Campe, Corsotus carried away (hauing and dancing to the great griefe of their companions) were glad, when after seuen dayes iourney they escaped from those continuall slaughters, wherewith they had bin vexed by those Barbarians. Hence trauailing through a good champ Country, inhabited by a Nation called the Seruants, they came to the Riuer Centrites, and the Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any disturbance about fiue or three score miles to the heads of the Riuer Tygris, and passing ouer them, trauelled as farre further without resistance, till they were encountred by Tiribazus at the Riuer Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Country for the Persian, and had great fauour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seeme to haue bin a Schoole, where the Art of Falshood was taught as wisedom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made vpon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As soone as he had made this league, he hasted to Armie, and besetting the Streights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishoneſt than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes to make many fires, and scatter themselues abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discouered, & by a Souldier of his that was take prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes, taking this captiue with them for a guide, sought him out; & comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arriue there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-curriors, chased him away. They tooke his Pauilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armie went Northward, and passing Euphrates, not far below the springs thereof, trauailed with much difficulty through deepe snow, being followed aloofe by the enemie, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behinde. The inhabitants of the Country, through which they marched, had their wintering houses vnderground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselues in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable iourney, which had consumed many of them with extreame cold, they departed, leading with them many bond-slaues, and driuing away (besides other Horses and Cattaile) foure Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

§. X.

Xenophon Gouernour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greekes with traunes of feigned loue, is disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

§. XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering vpon the Riuer Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

Without impediment they came to the Riuer Phasis, where vpon the Mountaines the people called Phasiani, Tibareni, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations [illegible] were were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest, which caused these people to flye, euery one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who conueying all their prouision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place vvas forced, wherein great store of cattaile were taken, the people hauing captiuitie, threw themselues head-long downe the rockes, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselues vpon them. Here vvas taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which serued to feed them, trauailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but stroakes. The Chalybes vvere a very stout Nation, vvell armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions liuing, who vvere glad, when after seuen dayes iourney they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence trauailing through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adioyning, vied them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, vvhence they might discouer the Euxine Sea. From Gymnias (vvhich was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After fiue dayes march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea, towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (vvhom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselues, who borne in that place had bin sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arriued in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like, for the Armie hauing now good leisure to repose themselues among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

* Trabisond a Colonie of the Greekes, situate in the bottome of the Euxine Sea.

§. XII.

How the Armie began at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to vetturne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequuted the same purpose.

HAuing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Nauigation. To this purpose Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by meanes of Anaxibius the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he vvould prouide Vessels to embarke them. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their naugation. Least all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land, vvhereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue eare, being desirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrie fearing what inconuenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntiani, vvhich they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabisonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staied to increase the fleet. After long aboade, when victuals began to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was already quite wasted, they were faine to embarke their sicke men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arriued. Here the Armie being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand & fiue hundred men. From hence they passed through the Countrie of the Mossynæci, who were diuided diuided into factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne them with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus vvere; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, hauing neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sicke men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sicke in conuenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to [c] Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings and threatning to ioyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meere necessitie had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deale with them and the Paplagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it selfe, to vvhich, if cause vvere giuen, they would lend assistance. Vpon this answere the Embassadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the many and great Riuers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceiued, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; prouided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to imbarke euery one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

[b] Cotyora a Port-Towne in the same Region.

§. XIII.

Of dissension which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

Hitherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolue and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with priuate respects to their seuerall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope; Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable vvorke to build a City in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, diuining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he imployed had receiued a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not giue battaile in ten daies: he therefore, hauing preserued his mony carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enioy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was diulged, which was interpreted according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, some approuing the motion, but the greater part reiecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, vvere sore afraid, lest the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselues at home, should giue successe to the proiect. Which to preuent, they promised to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered mony to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vndertooke to giue the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set saile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Thrace; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired onely the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would haue them to set forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arriued at their iournies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from out-running his fellowes, and driuen to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood ſtood with his good liking. Alſo the other Captaines were much troubled and affraid, when they perceiued, that ſhips were prepared ſufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promiſed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now reſolued for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perſwaded them to this reſolution, thought it the wiſeſt way to furniſh them with a Nauie whileſt they were in good readineſſe, to depart, but to keep the mony to themſelues. The Captaines therfore, who being diſappointed by theſe townes, found themſelues in great danger of their men, whom they had deceiued with faire hopes, repented much of their faire offers, & ſignifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make propoſition to the Armie, of taking the ſhips, & ſayling to Phaſis, where they might ſeize vpon Lands, and plant themſelues in ſuch wiſe as ſhould ſtand beſt with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buſineſſe, they began to vvorke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reſt. Theſe newes becomming publike, bred a ſuſpition of Xenophon, as if he had won the reſt of the Captaines to his purpoſe, and meant now to carry the Army quite another vvay from their own home. Wherfore aſſembling the Companies, he gaue them ſatisfaction, and withall complained of ſome diſorders which he cauſed them to redreſſe. A generall inquiſition was likewiſe made of offences committed ſince the death of Cyrus, which being puniſhed, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embaſſadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who ſending preſents, deſired peace of the Greeks: the Embaſſadours were friendly entertained, & peace concluded, vvhich needed not to haue bin ſought, for that the Greeks hauing now their fleet in a readines, did ſoon weigh Anchors, & ſet ſaile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cheriſophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promiſed to giue the Army pay aſoone as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great diſſenſion and diſtraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and reſcued by Xenophon.

THe neerer that they approached to Greece, the greater vvas their deſire to make prouiſion for themſelues, that they might not returne home emptie handed. Wherefore truſting well that if the charge of the Armie were abſolutely committed to one ſufficient man, he might the more conueniently procure the good of them all; they determined to make Xenophon ſole Commander of all; in whoſe fauour as well the Captaines as the common Souldiers were very earneſt and violent. But he, either fearing to diſpleaſe the Lacedæmonians, who were iealous of him already (being incenſed by that fugitiue who forſooke the Army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ſhips) or moued by ſome tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill ſucceſſe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour vvas laid vpon Cheriſophus a Lacedæmonian. It ſeemes that Xenophon, conſidering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wiſely in yeelding to ſuch tokens as forbad him to accept it: eſpecially, knowing ſo well their deſire, which vvas, by right or by wrong to get wealth wherſoeuer it might be found, without all regard of Friend or Foe. Cheriſophus had bin Generall but ſixe or ſeuen dayes, vvhen he vvas depoſed, for hauing bin vnwilling to rob the Towne of Heraclea which had ſent preſents to the Campe, and bin very beneficiall vnto them in lending ſhips for their tranſportation. Two daies they had ſailed by the coaſt of Aſia, when being paſt thoſe great Riuers, which would haue giuen impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where conſulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one ſeditious man began to put them in minde of ſeeking to get ſomwhat for themſelues, telling them that all their prouiſion would be ſpent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other neceſſaries could not be had without mony; for which cauſe he gaue aduice to ſend meſſengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giuing the Citizens to vnderſtand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thouſand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which ſumme amounteth to two thouſand and ſixe hundred pound ſtarling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the ſum raiſed to ten thouſand Cyzicens at leaſt: which to require, they thought Cheriſophus as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the busines which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent; who in such wise deliuered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Wals. When the Souldiers perceiued themselues to be disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians & Achæans; they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Aboue foure thousand and fiue hundred they were, all heauily armed, who electing ten Captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea & Byzantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good seruice already, and could not haue bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the Riuer Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to conuey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leauing to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heraclea, & Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, diuided themselues into ten Companies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fiue or sixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and so was that part of the country surprised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendeuous was an high piece of ground, where some of them arriued, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble & danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks loden with booty, tooke the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill wheron they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians & Achæans: who wanting the assistance of horse, & hauing neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driuen to stand meerly vpon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds receiued, the Darts & Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driuen from their watering place, & enforced to craue parley. Whatsoeuer the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for assurance they would giue none, without w^ch the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trauailers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiuing by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallans had foolishly throwne themselues, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discouer, & to scowre the waies; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoeuer they found combustible; wherby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within fiue mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiuing this, thought certainly that he would haue fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to haue giuen battell, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he maruailed that the Greeks were so farre departed; concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they remoued at break of day, & perceiued by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which iourny he ouertooke them. They embraced Him and His, with great ioy: Confessing that they themselues had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should haue come by night; wherein finding themselues deceiued, they were affraid lest he had forsaken them, and therfore hastened away, to ouertake him, and ioyne with him. So they arriued at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That whosoeuer from thenceforth made any motion to disioyne the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of diuers pieces of seruice done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betweene the Lacedæmonians and the Persian.

THe Hauen of Calpas lay vnder a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very conuenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities, that might haue allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should finde some deuice to haue setled himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to liue at home; neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wiues, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found aduantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrailes, did indeed forbid their departure: so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Country, vntill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were ioyned to the rest of the Army, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neer at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Country lying in wait to entrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troups falling vpon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew fiue hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine there by. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that suruiued, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, & breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; vvhich hauing intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which vvere lately slaine, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistants. In this iourny his demeanour vvas very honourable. For hauing giuen buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hils adioyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with halfe the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight vvell that day, hauing eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the vneasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Enemy a faire and easie way, by vvhich he might flye from them. These perswasions vvere followed vvith so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Country forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not sodainely be conueighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, vvho at good leisure gathered the Haruest of these bad Neighbours fields. This vvas the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they vvere not onely suffered quietly to enioy the spoile of the country, but vvhen the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great booty, which they carried away vnto Chrysopolis, a city neer vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visite his Prouince, vvhere they might haue found great vvealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waft them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to giue the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arriued at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Riuers, that he not onely denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their liues to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his iniurious dealings, they seized vpon Byzantium, vvhich by Xenophons perswasion they forbare to sacke; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than euer their forefathers had vndertaken. Likewise it was the onely remarkeable action which the time afforded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already sowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell; which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them aide, whereby to recouer their liberty; & obtained their request. For a power was sent ouer, vnder conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already reuolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensiue War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

§. I.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make Warre vpon Artaxerxes.

IT seemes that the Lacedæmonians did well perceiue in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed vnto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no aduantage might slip, which could serue to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had reuealed the basenesse of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselues had gotten, vpon tearmes of extreame disaduantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of vndertaking vpon this huge vnweildy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the ioyntforces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able to giue them resistance, in all that long iourny of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty fiue furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred fourescore and one, a very painfull march of one yeare and three moneths. Neuertheless the ciuill distraction wherwith Greece was miserably torne, & especially that hote fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leauing it questionable, whether Agesilaus, hauing both the same, and far greater forces, could haue wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commendation of magnanimity and faire behauiour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly soeuer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being onely a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons own iourny, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with sixe thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agesilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

Thimbro receiuing Xenophons men, began to take in Townes, and to entertaine all such as were willing to reuolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to haue had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to liue vnder the gouernment of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did loue him. The managing of the warre begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was diuided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, vvho did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and hauing the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a priuate hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes and forthwith entred Æolis, which was vnder the iurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Prouince in few dayes, he brought into his owne power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gaue easie succesle to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherin she behaued her selfe so well, that she not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernment: but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certaine Townes adioyning; and sundry times gaue assistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mysians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greeks, who for valour by her good vsage did her great seruice. But somwhat before the arriuall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seuenteene yeares old: which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to haue beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers vvith presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely reiected by Pharnabazus, but reuenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine vvas driuen into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Towne stood out foure dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were couetous of liberty) the Gouernour ſtriuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepſis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, ſent Embaſſadours to Dyrcillidas, deſiring leaue to ſpeake with him, and pledges for his ſecurity: vpon the deliuery of which he iſſued out of Scepſis, and comming into the Camp, made offer to ioyne with the Greekes vpon ſuch conditions, as might ſeeme reaſonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to ſet the Citizens freely at liberty. And preſently vpon theſe words they marched toward Scepſis. When Midias perceiued that it was in vaine to ſtriue againſt the Army, and the Towneſ-men, who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few houres in the City, did a ſacrifice to Minerua, & then leading away the Garriſon of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forſake his Company, but followed him, earneſtly intreating that he might be ſuffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they ſhould be opened; for (quoth Dyrcillidas) I muſt here likewiſe doe a ſacrifice to Minerua. The Traitour, not daring to make deniall, cauſed his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking poſſeſſion of the place, tendred pay to the Garriſon, who did not refuſe to ſerue vnder his Enſignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were ſeized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene ſubiect to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greekes: and ſo the murderous wretch was ſent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might finde any place to hide his deteſted head. Dercyllidas, hauing in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purpoſed for the eaſe of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he tooke Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any deſire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer enſuing, the truce being recontinued, held; in which time, beſides the waſting of Bythinia, the neck of Land ioyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being foure or fiue miles in breadth; by which meanes eleuen Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incurſions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Camp. Likewiſe the City of Atarne was taken, which was of great ſtrength, and very well ſtored with prouiſion. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to diuert the warre into Caria, where was the ſeate of Tiſſaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneaſie to recouer all the Townes of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly Office) being appointed to ioyne with him. Though it was manifeſt that Tiſſaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of neceſſity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus hauing reſpect to the Kings ſeruice, came to aſſiſt his priuate enemy Tiſſaphernes, and ſo paſſing into Caria, they thruſt Garriſons into all places of ſtrength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for reſiſtance. As theſe Perſians were deſirous to keepe the warre from their owne doores, ſo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the ſpoile and danger of the war, by transferring it into Caria. For which cauſe he paſſed the Riuer of Maander, and not looking to haue bin ſo ſoon encountered, marched careleſly through the Country: when on the very ſodaine the whole Army of Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus was diſcouered, conſiſting of Perſians, Carians, & ſome Mercenary Greeks, who were all marſhalled in very good order to preſent battaile. The odds was too apparant, both in numbers of men, and in readineſſe, as alſo in aduantage of ground: for the Perſian had a great multitude of Horſe, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of ſuch places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themſelues to preſent flight; or abiding a while for ſhame, did plainly diſcouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wiſe. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponneſians regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight: which muſt needes haue brought them to deſtruction, if the counſaile of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiuing the opportunity of ſo great a victory, was not willing to let it ſlip. But Tiſſaphernes, who naturally was a coward, ſeeing that countenance of reſiſtance was made, began to conſider what ſtrange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had ſhewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like reſolution, held it the wiſeſt way to craue parley; the concluſion of which was, That a truce ſhould bee made, to laſt vntill Tiſſaphernes might receiue anſwer from the King, & Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enioy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, & leaue the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it serued to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who desired to auoide the Warre by procrastination, which he durst not aduenture to finish by triall of a battaile.

§. III.

How the Lacedæmonians tooke reuenge vpon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceiued against the State of Sparta.

IN the meane season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces receiued by them during the late Warres, when leisure was wanting to the requittall of such petty iniuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympiaque games, had set a fine vpon the City of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnity; and publiquely whipt one of them, that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing sacrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vsed great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subiection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Warres: though little they cared for the liberty of such Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to worke very slowly: but hauing now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gaue present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first yeare an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the City it selfe was driuen to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subiects freely to enioy their liberty, and to haue her owne wals throwne downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vse modestly, finding themselues to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians & Bœotians, whose aide hauing bin of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it selfe, they could not smother their dislike of their vnequall diuision following the victory; which gaue to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes & Corinth, only security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnes of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge iniuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the Warre to extremity, leauing the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselues had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

§. IV.

§. IV.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the warre diuerted into another Prouince, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successour. How careless the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to ioyne with that of Dercillidas, he took his way in great pompe to Aulis in Boeotia, a Hauen, lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon he meant also to doe sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers; they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himselfe and his Country in a new warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his maine intendment. Hauing landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and mony from Artaxerxes; whilest Agesilaus was busie in setling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus receiued a plaine message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his aboade by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by periury deserued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should prouide victuals & other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes beleeue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plains of Meander, hoping therby to stop the passage of a heauie foot-Army, not suffering them to passe into that Country which was fittest for their seruice. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoyle without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish hauing the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelue men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes hauing enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted, he entred vpon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, and not only tooke a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without assistance of their infantery, he gaue them battaile, and had a great victory, taking their Campe in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heauie vpon Tissaphernes, who either vpon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master hauing him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way; he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by periury he could aduance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisedome, euen in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himselfe most perfect; for supposing posing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation he should one way or other circumuent the Greeks, and make them weary of Asia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunity of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it seemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found such meanes whereby the danger it selfe might haue beene auoided: as not louing to haue warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agesilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enioy their owne lawes and liberty, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Army be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirty Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensiue and on the defensiue part. For Agesilaus hauing entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his seuerall Prouinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: & those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subiect likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their owne gouernment could be preserued free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deseruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad, and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prouinciall Gouernour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Country giuen in charge vnto each of them, receiued, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as euery one was desirous to make his owne Territory yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himselfe and his; but sate still as an idle beholder, whence perhaps by ioyning their forces, it had not bin vneasie to recompence the spoile of one Country, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

§. V.

The Warre and Treaty betweene Agesilaus and Pharnabazus.

Agesilaus hauing thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might haue encreased his power, and giuen assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were discontented and stood vpon bad termes with the great King; whom he lost againe as easily, by meanes of some slight iniury done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for feare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neer as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vneasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had beene so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his loue (which had been such, that besides many other hazzards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driuen to run a-shore at Abydus, aduenadventured to ride into the Seas as farre as he could finde any ground, & fight on horseback against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That hauing warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agesilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would reuolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time onely Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Army should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty, & for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their vnthankefulnesse with full reuenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hyred with gold from the Persian.

IN the meane while Tithraustes, perceiuing that Agesilaus meant nothing lesse than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, tooke a wise course, whereby the City of Sparta was not onely driuen to looke to her owne, and give ouer her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territory. He sent into Greece fifty talents of siluer, to be imploied in raising war against the Lacedæmonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principal men of the Thebans, Argiues, & Corinthians, that all those Estates hauing formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint, & vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Armes, that they themselues might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either hauing the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adiudged vnto them, and receiued yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recouering a great deale more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuasion made vpon Phocis, wasting that Country in the maner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility betweene Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, & ready consent to their suit; it being the maner of the Lacedæmonians, to deferre the acknowledgment of iniuries receiued, vntil occasion of reuenge were offered, & then to discouer their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunity to worke their owne wils, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, & hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherfore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, & with such forces as he could leuie, to attend the comming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to ioyne with Lysander, & make a speedy end of the warre. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seeke what help they could abroad, for as much as their owne strength was farre too little to make resistance against such mighty preparations. It was not vnknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little auaileable, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which maner of tergiuersation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselues into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course, to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendship lately shewne in their refusall of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirty Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour sake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former Estate & Dignity. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirty, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the City to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had receiued. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedæmonians in this Warre; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay still, waiting the arriuall of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to do somewhat that might aduance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Towne, and was slaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victory did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Army did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreame danger; but their spirits were soon reuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battaile, Pausanias durst not hazzard a new fight with them, but receiuing the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territory; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driuen to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to helpe his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, assisted by Pharnabazus, ouercomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recouers the mastery of the Seas; and rebuilds the wals of Athens.

THis good successe, & the confederacy made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argiues, Corinthians, Euboeans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedæmonians as neereas they might, to their owne doom; Considering that the force of Sparta it selfe, was not great, but grew more and more by the adiunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiuing the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, & promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellespont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had giuen battaile to the Lacedæmonians, & the remainder of their Associates; but with ill successe. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argiues & Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken & defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battaile meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent ouer into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slaine. The same man, whose endeuour had brought the Athenians into order, by aduancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew ſtrong at Sea, when the City was deſpoiled of her old reputation, & ſcarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus conſidering how much it imported the King his Maſter, to haue the Greeks diuided into ſuch factions, as might vtterly diſable them from vndertaking abroad, thought it the ſafeſt way for himſelfe, during theſe broiles, to take ſuch order, that he ſhould not need any more, to ſeeke peace by entreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vnprouoked had ſold his loue for thirty Talents. To which purpoſe he furniſhed Conon the Athenian with eight ſhips, who had eſcaped, when the Fleet of Athens was ſurprized by Lyſander at Ægos-Potamos; giuing him the command of a great Nauy, wherwith he requited the loſſe receiued at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like deſtruction of their Fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon ſailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, ſo ſtrong a Nauie, and ſo much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouering the Signiory which they had loſt.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry ſmall victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians loſe all in Aſia; The Athenians recouer ſome part of their old Dominion.

NEuertheleſſe the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for ſome yeares the honour of their Eſtate, endangered very greatly by this loſſe at Sea. For Ageſilaus obtained the better with his horſe-men from the Theſſalians, who were accounted the beſt riders in Greece: He waſted Bœotia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea againſt the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee ouer-threw; and by his Marſhall Gylis forraged the Country of Locris: which done, hee returned home.

The gain of theſe victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many loſſes, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquiſh the Orchomenians, who ſtood oppoſite vnto them, & retired vnbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Ageſilaus charged them in the returne from the purſuite. Likewiſe Gylis was ſlaine with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and ſome other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed againſt the Corinthians, were repayed with equall dammage receiued in the parts adioyning; many Towns being eaſily taken, & as eaſily recouered. The variety of which enterfeats was ſuch, that the Thebans themſelues were drawn by the loſſe of the hauen of Corinth, to ſue for peace, but could not get audience, till ſuch time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embaſſadours being ſent for, and willed to doe their meſſage, required only in ſcorne, to haue a ſafe conduct giuen them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incurſions, wherin the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt moſt loſſe, their whole ſtate being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary ſide, vntill Ageſilaus repayed theſe inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did ſo afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driuen to ſue for peace. But the affairs at Sea were of moſt conſequence, vpon which the ſucceſſe of all depended. For when the Towns of Aſia perceiued, that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in an hard war at home, but almoſt diſabled to paſſe the Seas, hauing loſt their Fleet at Cnidus; they ſoon gaue eare to Pharnabazus, who promiſed to allow that they ſhould vſe their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Gouernours. Only the City of Abydus did ſtand firme, wherin Dercyllidas lay, who did his beſt to contain all the Townes about Helleſpont, in the alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, becauſe the Athenian Fleet vnder Thraſybulus took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered vnto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the Warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceiue how vneasie a thing it would be, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselues, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not onely to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leaue them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, & euery Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither haue disquieted the Persian, by an offensiue warre, nor haue made any good defence against him, but would haue left it easie for him in continuance of time, to haue taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himselfe Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to giue all from themselues and others, and make all a-like weak; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselues, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe ioyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their seuerall Embassadors oppose themselues vnto it; & for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himselfe to bring friends and foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did seek to repay the harme done by Agesilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Thimbro was sent into Asia to make warre vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land, grew almost to the maner of Piracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was slaine by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidas was remoued from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised & slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slaine by the way at Aspendus. The city of Rhodes had long before ioyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their maner) an Aristocratie, or the Gouernment of a few the principall Citizens; wheras contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselues, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a gouernment like vnto their own: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to fauour Sparta, & the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Ægina roued vpon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, & besiege their Towne: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Ilanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, hauing lost foure of thirteen. The losse of these ships was soon recompenced by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Ægina, whereupon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the City of Athens, hauing but newly raised her wals; hauing not by any fortunate & important battell secured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending vpon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discouered themselues irresolute in the common cause; would send a Fleet & an Army to Cyprus, in defence of Euagoras, when the mastry of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the eie of Pyræus, had ability to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that City did cause it vsually to embrace more than it could compasse; so the insolency & shamelesse iniustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keep themselues farre out of sight, and to seek emploiments at such distance diſtance as might ſecure them from the eies of the enuious, & from publike iudgements, out of which, few or none eſcaped. For which cauſe Timotheus did paſſe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Country well could haue ſpared: with which he returned not when the buſineſſe in Cyprus came to an end, but ſought new aduentures in Egypt; whereby aroſe neither thankes to himſelfe, nor profit to his City, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleſſe of things at hand, had a notable blow giuen vnto them, ſhortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauen. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Gouernour of Ægina, conceiued a ſtrong hope of ſurpriſing the Nauie of Athens, as it lay in Piræus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ſhips prepared for the fight, than with twenty lying in harbour, whoſe Mariners were aſleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore he ſailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) moſt of the men on ſhore, and few or none left aboord to make reſiſtance: by which meanes hee tooke many ſhips laden with merchandizes, many fiſher-men, paſſengers, and other Veſſels, alſo three or foure Gallies; hauing ſunke or broken, and made vnſeruiceable, as many of the reſt as the time would ſuffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters giuen to him in marriage, with whom he liued about the Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Aſia; by whoſe aſſiſtance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Helleſpont; in ſuch wiſe, that perhaps they ſhould not haue needed the peace, which they themſelues procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were ſuch as are mentioned before, giuing freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and diuiding the Country into as many ſeuerall States as were petty Boroughes in it. Thus Artaxerxes hauing bought his owne peace with money, did likewiſe by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controuerſies betweene the Greekes, diſpoſing of their buſineſſe in ſuch wiſe as ſtood beſt with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Aſia and Cyprus ſhould be his owne; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus bee ſubiect to Athens; all other Greeke Towns, as well the little as the great, be ſet at liberty; and that whoſoeuer ſhould refuſe this peace, vpon them the approuers of it ſhould make warre, the King aſſiſting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ſhips, and treaſure. The Athenians were ſo diſcouraged by their loſſes at Sea; the Lacedæmonians by reuolt of their Confederates, and the neceſſity of maintaining many Garriſons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miſeries of the warre, whereof they ſaw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did conſent vnto theſe Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking vpon themſelues the execution, did not onely compell the Argiues to depart out of Corinth (which vnder pretence of defending they held by Garriſons, lately thruſt into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Bœotia free, of which Prouince Thebes had alwaies held the gouernment; the Thebans themſelues being alſo comprehended vnder the name of the Bœotians; but cauſed the Mantineans to throw downe their owne City, and to dwell in Villages; alleaging that they had formerly beene accuſtomed ſo to doe, though purpoſing indeed to chaſtiſe them, as hauing beene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By theſe courſes the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the ſmall Townes in Greece would, when occaſion ſhould require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their liberty; and that the great Cities hauing loſt all their dependants, would be vnable to make oppoſition.

The warre which the Lacedæmonians made vpon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treaſon; and Olynthus by famine.

WHileſt theſe Warres, which ended without either victory or profit, conſumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne ſo mighty, that ſhee did not onely command her Neighbour Townes, but vvas alſo become terrible to places farre remooued, and to Sparta it ſelfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, vvho following the vſuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to ſet at libertie the places ouer which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almoſt now driuen him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themſelues. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neereſt vnto the danger of thoſe incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too ſtrong for all Greece, if continuance of time ſhould giue it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherfore they requeſted aſſiſtance, but in ſuch termes as did ſound of compulſion, proteſting that either they muſt warre vpon Olynthus, or become ſubiect vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a haſtie leuie of men, two thouſand being preſently ſent away, with promiſe to be ſeconded by a greater Armie. Whileſt theſe two thouſand gaue ſuch beginning to the warre, as agreed with their ſmall number, the body of the Armie following them, ſurprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by ſome of the Magiſtrates, who ſought to ſtrengthen their faction by the ſlauerie of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made between them; vvhich cauſed the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of puniſhment. In concluſion, profit ſo farre ouer-weighed honeſtie, that the deede vvas approoued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driuen into baniſhment, and the Traitors rewarded with the gouernment of the Citie: by whoſe authoritie, and the force of the Gariſon, the Thebans vvere compelled to ſerue the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This acceſſe of power hauing ſtrengthened the Lacedæmonians, cauſed them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, vvhich (notwithſtanding the loſſe of one great battaile, & ſome other diſaſters) they compelled at length by famine to render it ſelfe vnto their obedience.

§. XI.

How the Thebans recouered their libertie, driuing out the Lacedæmonian Garriſon.

AFter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almoſt three yeares, it ſeemed that no Eſtate in Greece was able to make head againſt that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a meanes to ſhake off their yoake, and gaue both example and meanes to others to do the like. One of the baniſht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magiſtrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie vvherewith his Countrie vvas oppreſſed, pleaſed him no better than it did thoſe who for feare of it vvere fledde from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene theſe two, that ſoone found very good ſucceſſe, being managed thus. Seuen of the baniſhed men forſooke Athens priuily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; vvhere ſpending the next day ſecretly, they came late in the euening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and ſo paſſed vndiſcouered vnto the houſe of Charon, vvhom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conſpiracie. The day following, a ſolemne feaſt being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promiſed the Gouernours, who were inſolent & luſtfull men, that he would conueigh vnto them that night the moſt beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they ſhould take their pleaſure. Hauing cheared them with ſuch hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came that he could not make good his promiſe, vnleſſe they vvould diſmiſſe their followers, becauſe the Gentlewomen, who attended without a Chamber, vvould not endure that any of the ſeruants ſhould ſee their faces. Vpon this occaſion the attendants were diſmiſſed, and the Conſpirarors, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; vvho taking aduantage of the Gouernours looſe behauiour, ſlew them all vpon the ſodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden vnder their garments. Then preſently caſting off their diſguiſe, they went to other places, where feigning themſelues to come to the Gouernours vpon buſineſſe, they got admittance, and likewiſe ſlew thoſe which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the priſon, ſlew the Gaoler, and ſet at liberty ſuch as they thought meet; and being followed by theſe deſperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Caſtle hearing the ſodaine Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be ſtronger than indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwiſe miſtruſted, that it was a practice to discouer such as would be forward vpon occasion of reuolting. But assoon as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adioyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated by the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countri-men, but procured some Athenians to ioyne with them, & thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, vpon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arriued at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recouering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her own liberty; Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who hauing wearied his followers with a toilesome Winters iourney, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thespiæ, to infest the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the Countrie adioyning, and draue away Cattell, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the War, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselues.

Chap. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra, to the battaile of Mantinea.

§. 1.

How Thebes and Athens ioyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselues, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THE Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much grauitie in all their proceedings, but one dishonourable rule that held, That all respects withstanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, euen by the best & wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouer-weening men, it seldome failed to bring vpon them in stead of profit vniustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phœbidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Piræum. For, howsoeuer Agesilaus did spoyle the Country about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to looke abroad, sayling to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and hauing in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as the Peloponnesian Warre, to surround Peloponnesus with a Naue, afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this warre, should haue soone come to a good ende, which neuertheless, being prosequuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much deiected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiuing how Thebes encroached euery day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had bin dependants vpon Athens, and finding themselues, whilest engaged in such a war, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolued to settle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it vvas their intent to finish the Warre; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; vvho readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treaty of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the couragious wisedome of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countrimen, vvhat vvas to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soone agree; but vvhen the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians; Agesilaus required them to sweare in their own name, and to leaue the Bœotians free, vvhom they had lately reduced vnder their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the City of Sparta should giue example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bœotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was vvell and truly spoken; but was heard vvith no patience: For Agesilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by vvhom he was drawn backe out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory vvhich he had hoped to atchieue by the Persian war, did now passionately vrge that point of setting the Bœotians at libertie; & finding it as obstinately refused, he dasht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, vvho receiued command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; vvhich he did, and vvas there slain at Leuctra, and vvith him the flower of his Armie. This battale of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that euer vvere fought between the Greekes, vvas not so notable for any circumstance fore-going it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta; but especially, for that after this battell (betweene which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedæmonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much do the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly endured, aduance the affaires of the distressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth & ease had through luxurie, retchlesnes, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians tooke vpon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas inuadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians, refusing to take aduantage of this ouerthrow fallen vpon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did neuertheless sincerely giue them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon them selues the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, vvhich Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarels that might arise) had left vnperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, vnder the stile of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their own pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their town, reedifie it, and allie themselues with such of the Arcadians as stood well affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, vvere distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken & keepe them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not giue impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called-in forraine helpe. Then was an Army sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Boeotians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; vvith the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in fauour of the Arcadians, who had, vpon expectation of their comming, abstained from giuing battaile to Agesilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas ioyned vvith the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia vvas inuaded & spoyled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could haue found beliefe it any had foretold it. Almost 600. yeares were spent, since the Dorians, vnder the posteritie of Hercules, had seized vpon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet vvas not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeares were not fully past, since all Greece vvas at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once looke vpon, nor the mighty forces of Athens, and other enemie-States had dared to set foot on, sauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preserue the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaues as were vvilling to beare Armes in defence of the State, & somewhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to giue them succour. From Corinth & some Townes of Peloponnesus they receiued speedy assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, hauing re-builded the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a new by calling home the ancient inhabitants, vvhom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselues.

S. III.

The Composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans, who againe inuade and spoyle Peloponnesus. The vnfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis iournie therefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, vvhich vvas to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselues might be Generals by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was reiected, because the Mariners and others that were to be imployed at Sea, vvere men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, vvhereof the Land-Armie vvas compounded, vvho being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, vvere to haue serued vnder the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it vvas agreed that the Authority should be diuided by time, the Athenians ruling fiue daies, the Lacedæmonians other fiue, and so successiuely that each of them should haue command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition vvas more regarded than the common profit; which must of necessitie be very slowly aduanced, vvhere consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inuasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that hauing fortified Athmia from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Country vvithout resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diuiding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for vvhich it was concluded; so the example of it vvrought their good, by filling the enemies heads vvith the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their owne numbers vvhich they brought into the field, and hauing found by many trials that their people vvere not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernment, vvith their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing vvhose greatnesse they should strengthen their owne yoke. Hereupon they began to demeane themselues very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbors, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For, a motion of generall peace hauing bin made (vvhich tooke not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans & their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleaſing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Eſtate. Embaſſages of the Greekes to the Perſian: with the reaſons why he moſt fauoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Perſian Empire. The fruitleſſe iſſue of the Embaſſages.

THe Thebans eſpecially reioyced at the Arcadians misfortune, conſidering, that without their aide, the ſucceſſe of all enterpriſes proued ſo ill; whereas they themſelues had by their owne power accompliſhed very well whatſoeuer they tooke in hand, and were become not onely victorious ouer the Lacedæmonians, but patrons ouer the Theſſalonians, and moderatours of the great quarrels that had riſen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleaſed them beſt, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hoſtage vnto Thebes. Hauing therefore obtained ſuch reputation, that little ſeemed wanting to make them abſolute Commanders of all Greece, they ſought meanes of alliance with the Perſian king, to whom they ſent Embaſſadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whoſe reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they deſired; wherof two eſpeciall points were, That Meſſene ſhould remaine free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians ſhould forbeare to ſend their ſhips of Warre to Sea; only the latter of theſe two was ſomwhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did alſo ſend their Embaſſadours at the ſame time, of whom few or none receiued much contentment. For the King hauing found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a ſure partie in Greece, did vpon many weightie conſiderations reſolue, to binde the Thebans firmely vnto him; iuſtly expecting, that their greatneſſe ſhould be on that ſide his owne ſecuritie. The Athenians had beene meient enemies to his Crowne; and hauing turned the profit of their victories vpon the Perſian to the purchaſe of a great Eſtate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in ſuch puiſſant manner, that (ſundry grieuous misfortunes notwithſtanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by moſt of the Greekes, and ſupplied with treaſure, and all ſorts of aide by Darius Nothus; were not able to vanquiſh them, till their owne indiſcretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no ſooner eſtabliſhed their Dominion at home, than they vndertooke the conqueſt of Aſia, from vvhich though by the commotion raiſed in Greece with Perſian gold, they were called backe, yet hauing renewed their power, and ſettled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they ſhould vpon the next aduantage haue purſued the ſame enterpriſe, had not they beene empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwiſe had alwayes diſcouered a good affection to the Crowne of Perſia. They had ſided with Xerxes in his inuaſion of Greece; vvith Darius and the Lacedæmonians againſt Athens: And finally, hauing offered much contumely to Ageſilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Beſides all theſe their good deſeruings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroad; vvhereupon if perchance they ſhould haue any deſire, yet were they diſabled by the want of good hauen townes; which they could not ſeize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giuing liberty to all Cities that had at any time beene free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condeſcend vnto the requeſts of Pelodias, as farre forth as he might without giuing open defiance to the reſt of Greece; and by that meane he purchaſed his owne quiet, being neuer afterward moleſted by that Nation in the lower Aſia. The ill meanes which the Greekes had to diſturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Eſtate of Perſia ſhortly after theſe times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Prouinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene ſo compoſed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the reſt haue tranſported an Armie, to aſſiſt the reuolting Satraps, or Vice-royes of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Myſia, Lycia, Piſidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phenicie; humane reaſon can hardly find the meanes, by which the Empire could haue beene preſerued from that ruine, which the diuine Counſell had deferred vnto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conſpiracie of ſo many large and wealthy Prouinces, wanting ring a ſtrong body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in ſhort ſpace diſcuſſed, and vaniſhed like a miſt, without effect: theſe effeminate Aſiatiques wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, forſaking the common cauſe, and each man ſtriuing to be the firſt, that by treaſon to his company ſhould both redeeme the former treaſon to his Prince, and purchaſe withall his owne promotion with encreaſe of riches. Of this commotion, which in courſe of time followed ſome actions not as yet related, I haue rather choſen to make ſhort mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a ſudden ſtorme, raſhly commenced, idlely followed, and fooliſhly layed downe, hauing made a great noiſe without effect, and hauing ſmall reference to any other action regardable; as alſo becauſe in the whole reigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the inuaſion of Egypt, I finde nothing (this inſurrection, and a fruitleſſe iourney againſt the Caduſians excepted) worthy of any mention, much leſſe of digreſſion from the courſe of the buſineſſe in Greece. All, or the moſt of his time paſſed away ſo quietly, that he enioyed the pleaſures which an Empire ſo great and wealthy could affoord vnto ſo abſolute a Lord, with little diſturbance. The troubles which he found were onely or chiefly Domeſticall; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queene-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to ſuch as had beene the greateſt enemies to her ſonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: vpon whom, when by poyſon and miſchieuous practices ſhe had ſatisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth ſhe wholly applyed her ſelfe to the Kings diſpoſition, cheriſhing in him the lewd deſire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perſwaſion, which Princes, not endued with an eſpeciall grace, doe readily entertaine: That his owne will was the ſupreame law of his ſubiect, and the rule by which all things were to be meaſured and adiudged to be good or euill. In this imaginarie happineſſe Pelopidas, and the other Embaſſadours of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by ſo much more aſſured than they found him, by how much the concluſion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne aduantage, did ſeeme to promiſe, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the ſame felicity to him and his, or (at the leaſt) a full ſecuritie of danger from Greece, whence onely could any danger be feared. But ſuch foundations of eternity laied by mortall men in this tranſitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either ſhaken from heauen, or made vaine and vnprofitable, ere the frame can be raiſed to full heighth, by confuſion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Eſtates of Greece that had ſent Embaſſadours to the Perſian. For whereas it had beene concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who therby ſhould become the Iudges of all controuerſies that might ariſe, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the kings letters being ſolemnly publiſhed at Thebes, in the preſence of Embaſſadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for obſeruation of the forme of peace therein ſet down, a dilatorie anſwer was made by the Embaſſadors, who ſaid, that they were ſent to heare the articles; not to ſweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driuen to ſend vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had boldly refuſed it, ſaying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, diſappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatneſſe, but left them as it found them to relye vpon their own ſwords.

§. V.

How all Greece was diuided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, on the one ſide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults riſing in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did ſtand thus. Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatneſſe drawne all their followers into a cruell inteſtine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and eſpecially the Eſtate of theſe two Cities, was brought very low, did now conioyn their forces againſt the Thebans, who ſought to make themſelues Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, & Achaians, followed the party of theſe ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits receiued, or in diſlike diſlike of thoſe, who by ſtrong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not ſuddenly aſpire vvithout ſome iniurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom neceſſity had made warlike, & many victories in few yeares had filled with great ſpirits, and being ſo mighty in dependants, that ſhe had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponneſus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beſide excepted) vnder ſuch acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meere Vaſſallage, did hope to bring all Peloponneſus to the like obedience, wherein already ſhe had ſet good footing by her coniunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argiues had beene alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to vvhom they thought themſelues in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of loſing all: vvhich cauſed them to ſuſpect & enuie nothing more than the greatneſſe and honour of Sparta, taking truce vvith her vvhen ſhe was at reſt, and had leiſure to bend her whole force againſt them, but firmely ioyning with her enemies whenſoeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argiues vvere, in hatred of Sparta, ſure friends of Thebes, ſo the Arcadians, tranſported with a great opinion of their owne worthineſſe, had formerly renounced and prouoked againſt them their old Confederates & Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought conuenient by Epaminondas, & the State of Thebes, to ſend an Armie into Peloponneſus, before ſuch time as theſe wauering friends ſhould fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And ſurely great cauſe there was to ſuſpect the worſt of them, conſidering that without conſent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very ſtrange, & ſeemed no leſſe to the Athenians themſelues, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the ſame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheleſſe accept this new Confederacy, not relinquiſhing the old, becauſe they found that howſoeuer theſe Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they ſhould hereby be drawn ſomwhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponneſus with a ſtrong Armie. But this did rather haſten, than by any meanes ſtay, the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way ſomewhat more cleare for him (becauſe the Citie of Corinth, which lay vpon the Iſthmus, and had beene aduerſe to Thebes, was now, by miſeries of this grieuous warre, driuen to become Neutrall) tooke occaſion hereby, and by ſome diſorders among the Arcadians, to viſit Peloponneſus with an Armie, conſiſting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had riſen in Arcadia about conſecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, vnder pretence of imploying it to publique vſes. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occaſion ſuch as had leaſt wil to render account of the mony which had come into their hands, procured the Captaine of ſome Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take priſoners many of their Countrimen, as people deſirous of innouation. This vvas done: but the vp-roare thereby cauſed vvas ſo great, that the priſoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe ſcarce pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blam vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be ſhortly among them, to iudge of their fidelity, by the aſſiſtance which they ſhould giue him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponneſus. Theſe Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of ſo mighty a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently ſuſpect that great preparation to be made againſt themſelues. Hereupon ſuch of them as had before ſought meanes to ſettle the affaires of their Countrie, by drawing things to ſome good concluſion of peace, did now forthwith ſend to Athens for helpe, & withall diſpatched ſome of the principall among them as Embaſſadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themſelues to the common defence of Peloponneſus, now ready to be inuaded. This Embaſſage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, againſt whom they well knew, that all their forces, and beſt prouiſions, vvould be no more than very hardly ſufficient. Forbearing therefore to diſpute about prerogatiues, they (who had beene accuſtomed vnto ſuch a ſupremacie, as they would in no wiſe communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of ſecuring their owne Eſtate could not be thought vpon) did now very gently yeelde to the Arcadians, that the command of the Army in chiefe, ſhould be giuen, for the time, to that Citie, in whoſe Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible inuaſion of Peloponneſus by Epaminondas.

CErtaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firme conſent, and vniforme care of the common ſafetie. For, beſide the great forces raiſed out of the other parts of Greece, the Argiues and Meſſenians, prepared with all their ſtrength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who hauing lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, receiued there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would paſſe by Sea, whereupon he diſlodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the moſt of all Arcadia beſides, forthwith declared themſelues his. The common opinion was, that the firſt attempt of the Thebans, would be vpon ſuch of the Arcadians as had reuolted; which cauſed the Lacedæmonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinea vvith all diligence, and to ſend for Ageſilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that ſmall force of able men which remained in the Towne, they might be ſtrong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held ſo good eſpiall vpon his Enemies, that had not an vnknowne fellow brought haſty aduertiſement of his purpoſe to Ageſilaus, who vvas then well onward in the vvay to Mantinea, the Citie of Sparta had ſuddenly beene taken. For thither vvith all ſpeede and ſecrecie did the Thebans march, who had ſurely carried the Citie, notwithſtanding any defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Ageſilaus in all flying haſte got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the reſcue as faſt as it was able. The arriuall of the Lacedæmonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, ſo it preſented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinea. It vvas the time of Harueſt, vvhich made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried from their vvals into another quarter, would vſe the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattell into their fields, whileſt no enemie vvas neere that might empeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, ſending his horſe-men before him, to ſeize vpon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) vvere ſcattered abroad in the Countrie; farre more intent vpon their harueſt buſineſſe, then vpon the warre, whereof they were ſecure, as thinking themſelues out of diſtance. By vvhich preſumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a deſperate caſe; and the Towne it ſelfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemie ſhould haue taken all their prouiſion of victuals, vvith ſo many of the people as had not ouer-deerely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to ſocietie with Thebes. But at the ſame time, the Athenians comming to the ſuccour of their Confederates, whom they thought to haue found at Mantinea, vvere very earneſtly entreated by the Citizens to reſcue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were poſſible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer thoſe who otherwiſe vvere giuen as loſt. The Thebans were knowne at that time to be the beſt Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horſemanſhip had alwayes beene giuen to the Theſſalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations, yet the regard of honour ſo wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, vvhich had entred into this warre, vpon no neceſſitie of her owne, but onely in deſire of relieuing her diſtreſſed friends, they iſſued forth of Mantinea, not abiding ſo long as to refreſh themſelues, or their horſes with meate; and giuing a luſtie charge vpon the enemie, who as brauely receiued them, after a long and hot fight, they remained maſters of the field, giuing by this victory a ſafe and eaſie retrait to all that vvere without the wals. The whole power of the Beotians arriued in the place ſoone after this battaile, whom the Lacedæmonians and their Aſſiſtants were not farre behinde.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinea, hauing failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolued to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subiection. Hauing therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherein victory should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his owne desire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more aduantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great and sodaine a danger, the enemie ran to Armes, necessity enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that dayes seruice vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Lacedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the war was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians: the Athenians had the left wing; the Achæans, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the body of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the Lacedemonians, hauing by them the Arcadians, the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argiues held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flankes, onely a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could ioyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans preuailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were ouer-laied with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalian slings, that they were driuen to forsake the place, and leaue their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselues together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to haue giuen them ouer, and withall discouering some Companies of foot, which had been sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argiues, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, and was ready to turne backe, when the Elean squadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedemonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victory to either equally doubtfull: vnlesse perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as hauing borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeares, cannot be thought to haue gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiuing the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Bœotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them giue one foote of ground: taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, & cleaue the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who who may iuſtly be ſaid to haue carried the victory, ſeeing that they remained Maſters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, hauing driuen the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the ſlaughter of thoſe Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and ſerued meerely for oſtentation, ſhewing that by the fight they had obtained ſomewhat, which the Enemie could not get from them otherwiſe than by requeſt. But the Thebans arriued at the generall immediate end of battraile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifeſt confeſſion is expreſſed from them, who forſake the place which they had choſen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and proweſſe. This was the laſt worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedæmonian eſquadron, and forced it to giue backe in diſaray, was furiouſly charged on the ſodaine, by a deſperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiuing many wounds, he neuertheleſſe with a ſingular courage maintained the fight, vſing againſt the Enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his owne body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he receiued ſo violent a ſtroake with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the trunchion in his breſt. Hereupon he ſunke downe, and was ſoone conueighed out of the fight by his friends; hauing by his fall ſomewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would haue got his body,) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heauie miſchance, did with great ſlaughter compell their diſordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chaſe, being wearied more with the ſadneſſe of this diſaſter, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epamnondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Phyſitians, That when the head of the Dart ſhould be drawn out of his body, he muſt needes dye. Hearing this, he called for his ſhield, which to haue loſt, was held a great diſhonour: It was brought vnto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory; anſwer vvas made, that the Bœotians had won the field. Then ſaid he, It is faire time for me to dye, and withall ſent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both ſlaine; which being told him, He aduiſed the Thebans to make Peace, whileſt with aduantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to diſcharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon ſhould be drawne out of his body; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iſſue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinæa were two faire Daughters, in whom his memory ſhould liue.

So died Epaminondas, the worthieſt man that euer was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrie: for he equalled all others in the ſeuerall vertues, which in each of them were ſingular. His Iuſtice, and Sincerity, his Temperance, Wiſedome, and high Magnanimity, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in euery part whereof he ſo excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warrie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Induſtrious, and a Prouident Captaine. Neither was his priuate Conuerſation vnanſwerable to thoſe high parts, which gaue him praiſe abroade. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; reſolute in publique buſineſſe, but in his owne particular eaſie, and of much mildeneſſe: a louer of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie & pleaſant in ſpeech, farre from inſolence, Maſter of his own affections, and furniſhed with all qualities that might win and keepe loue. To theſe Graces were added great abilitie of body, much Eloquence, & very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philoſophy and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, reſted not in the ſweetneſſe of Contemplation, but brake forth into ſuch effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer-more been an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adioyning, and the higheſt command in Greece.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battaile of Mantinea was the greatest that had euer bin fought in that Country betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour, neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie, so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vndertaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for euery particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, euery one retaining what he presently had, & none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name compriſed in this new league, which caused the Lacedemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seeke after wealth by forraine employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeede, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded vnder Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntary, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrteus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, hauing retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissentions, and forraine inuasions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (easily procured with gold) they conceiued great hope, not onely to assure themselues, but to become Lords of the Prouinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might haue beene, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it self had soone come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proued a false Traitor, ioyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the mony of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country; though it seeme rather, that as he grudged because the King tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his seruice onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howsoeuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submission gaue him gentle entertainement; and Nectanebus (who seemes to haue beene the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of aduantage, prevailed so farre, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good seruice done to himselfe, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of siluer, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in Warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue euery one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. He was neuertheless very arrogant, peruerse, vniust and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrown; with which conceit being transported, & finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans & their Allies, he did euer after bear such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necessity to grow war-like, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations giuen to him by Xenophon his good friend, haue caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne grauity of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truely say, That as Pompey made great warres vnder sundry Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other, some quarrell with euery Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and medled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein also they were very like; Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of liberty, and each of them ruined the liberty of his Country by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis quàquam paria; The resemblance was neerer than the equality. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Gouernment only being changed: But the liberty of Greece, or of Sparta it selfe, was not forfeited vnto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the Signiory, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, vpon the death of Agesilaus, giue vp the Ghost, & the Lordship of the whole Country was seized by Philip king of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporary passages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM THE reigne of PHILIP of MACEDON, to the eſtabliſhing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONVS.

THE FOVRTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THe Greekes, of whom we haue already made large diſcourſe, not as yet wearied with inteſtine War, nor made wiſe by their vain contention for ſuperiority, do ſtill as in former times, continue the inuaſion and vaſtation of each other.

Againſt Xerxes, the greateſt Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their liberty, with as happy ſucceſſe as euer Nation had, & with no leſs honor, than hath euer bin acquired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, againſt thoſe Nations, they ſo little regarded what might come from them, who had ſo often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatſoeuer could be ſpared from their owne diſtraction at home, they tranſported ouer the Helleſpont, as ſufficient, to entertaine and buſie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with euery man of mark in the world, that they vnderfall, and periſh, by the hands and harmes which they leaſt feare; ſo fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to ſpeak) they had ſo little regard, as they grew euen then more violent in deuouring each other, when the faſt-growing greatneſſe of ſuch a Neighbour-King, ſhould, in regard of their owne ſafeties, haue ſerued them for a ſtrong argument of vnion and accord. But the glory of their Perſian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themſelues, and the rather to value at little the power & purpoſes of the Macedonians, becauſe thoſe Kings & States, which ſate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the father of Philip, ſo much weakened them, & won vpon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perſwaded themſelues) in any one age, likely to recouer recouer their owne, much lesse to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophy to consider; That all great alterations are stormelike, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decayed and broken banks, when great riuers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. Nor the Greeks did rather imploy themselues, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inundation, than seek to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the leuell of reason they might haue found to haue lien vnder it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Gracie Ciuitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes pendere nolunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striuing each of them to command all. Oros.l.3.c.12.

The Kingdome of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the sonne of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirme, of Iupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west, by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, & by Nation Argiues; who are listed as followeth. About some sixe yeares after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to leade a Colony into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Country, the weather being raynie and tempestuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle beene directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should either leade him, or flie before him; He pursued these Goates to the Gates of Edessa, and being vndiscouered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the aire, he entred their City without resistance, and possest it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty yeares. Cœnus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelue yeares. Tyrimas followed Cœnus, and ruled eight and twenty yeares. Paul.Diac. Chus.Theop. Antio.6. Euseb.in chro.

Perdiccas the first, the sonne of Tyrimas, gouerned one and fifty yeares: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirme, that hee appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successours, at Ægæ: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his Line & Race, as they continued to lay vp their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherin it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posterity of the Temenidæ failed in him: a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceiue, than foretold by Perdiccas. Sol.c.14. Plin.l.4.c.10.

Argæus succeeded vnto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty yeares. Euseb.in chro.

Philip the first, his Successour, reigned eight and twenty yeares.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned sixe and twenty yeares: in whose infancy the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and hauing obtained a great victory, they pursued the same, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome & their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, & returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselues that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his seruants) able to defend himselfe from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius the son of Fredegunda. Euseb.Iustin. Ammian.Thc. Ant.&c.Aimon.l.3.c.81.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twenty yeares.

Amyntas the first, succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty yeares; He liued at such time as Darius Histaspes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Army into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you haue heard before, were, for their insolent behauiour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Amyntas, and his Successour. Her. Euseb. Iust. &c.

Alexander surnamed the Rich, the sonne of Amyntas, gouerned Macedon three and forty yeares. He did not onely appeaſe the wrath of Megabazus, for the ſlaughter of the Perſian Embaſſadours, by giuing Gygea his Siſter, to Bubares of the bloud of Perſia, but by that match he grew ſo great in Xerxes grace; as he obtained all that Region betweene the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnited to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not theſe benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Xerxes being returned into Aſia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Perſian Army, Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purpoſes againſt them. He had three ſons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Her. lib. 8. Plat. Euſeb. Iuſt. &c.

Perdiccas the ſecond, the ſonne of Alexander, liued in the time of the Peloponneſian Warre, and reigned in all eight and twenty yeares. The Warres which he made were not much remarkeable: the Story of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his firſt ſixe bookes. He left behind him two ſons; Perdiccas, who was very young, and Archelaus, who was baſe borne.

Perdiccas the third, being deliuered to the cuſtody and care of Archelaus, was at ſeuen years of age caſt into a Well and drowned by his falſe Guardian: who excuſing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, ſaid, That the child in following a Gooſe haſtily, fell thereinto by miſaduenture. But Archelaus ſtayed not here: for hauing thus diſpatched his brother, he ſlew both his Vncle Alcetas the ſonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the ſon of this Alcetas, his Coſen Germaine, and enioyed the Kingdome of Macedon himſelfe foure and twenty years.

Plat. in Gorg. Ariſt. in Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Ariſtotle make mention, though he made himſelfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is ſaid, That he ſought by all means to draw Socrates vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Euripides the Tragedian. He had two ſons, Archelaus and Oreſtes.

Archelaus the ſecond ſucceeded his father, and hauing reigned ſeuen yeares, he was ſlaine in hunting, either by chance, or of purpoſe by Cratæus.

Oreſtes his younger ſonne was committed to the education of Æropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, & had the ſame meaſure which Archelaus had meaſured to his Pupil; for Æropus murdered him and vſurped the Kingdome, which he held ſome ſixe years: the ſame who denied paſſage to Ageſilaus King of Sparta, who deſired after his returne from the Aſian expedition, to paſſe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod. Polyæn. Plut. in Demet.

This Vſurper left three ſons, Pauſanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pauſanias ſucceeded his father Æropus, and hauing reigned one year, he was driuen out by Amyntas the ſon of Philip, the ſon of the firſt Perdiccas, the ſon of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preſerued, when Archelaus the Baſtard ſlew his Brother Perdiccas, his Vncle Alcetas, and his ſon Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very vnquietly) foure & twenty yeares; for he was not only infeſted by Pauſanias, aſſiſted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the ſaid Argæus, for two years diſpoſſeſt of Macedon: but on the other ſide, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neer the Ægean Sea, made themſelues for a while Maſters of Pella, the chiefe City of Macedon.

Amyntas the ſecond had by his Wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the ſecond, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the ſecond, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: Hee had alſo by his ſecond Wife Gygea, three Sons, Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward ſlaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomy, ſurnamed Alorites, of the City Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the ſecond reigned not much aboue one yeare, in which time he was inuaded by Pauſanias, the ſonne of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was alſo conſtrained (for the payment of a great ſum of mony) to leaue his youngeſt brother Philip in Hoſtage with the Illyrians, who had ſubiected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being inuited by the Aleuadæ againſt Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Theſſaly, hauing redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his aſſiſtance, entred into Confederacy with Pelopidas, being at that time in the ſame Country, with whom hee alſo left Philip with diuers other principall perſons for the gage of his promiſes to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Daughter Eurynoe or Exione, practiſed the death of Alexander her ſonne, with a purpoſe to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof he held Macedon for three yeares, but was ſoon after ſlaine by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwiſe of Philip being made pledge; and ſaith, That Amyntas his Father deliuered him for hoſtage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conueyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet liuing) was firſt ingaged to the Thebans, and deliuered for hoſtage a ſecond time by Alexander his brother. Diod. lib. 15. & 16.

Perdiccas the third, after hee had ſlaine Alorites his baſe brother, gouerned Macedon ſiue years, and was then ſlaine in a battaile againſt the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iuſtine affirmeth, that he periſhed by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander did. Iuſt. l. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of Philips reigne; and how he deliuered Macedon from the troubles wherein he found it entangled.

Philip the ſecond, the youngeſt ſonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, hauing beene inſtructed in all knowledge requiſite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had vnder Epaminondas, making an eſcape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the firſt yeare of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred foureſcore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was enuironed, hee tooke on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a ſonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition ſoone ouer-grew his modeſty, and hee was eaſily perſwaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall, the abſolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to ſay the truth, The neceſſity of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent & actiue. For, beſides the incurſions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did ſet vp in oppoſition Pauſanias; the Athenians, Argæus; ſonnes of the late Vſurper Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their owne Election. Theſe heauie burdens when Philip could not well beare, hee bought off the weightieſt by mony, and by faire promiſes vnloaded himſelfe of ſo many of the reſt, as hee ranne vnder the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with foure thouſand Macedonians, beſide theſe that were wounded and taken priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land vnder Mantias, did beate vpon him on all ſides and quarters of his Country: Yet after he had practiſed the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, he forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt enemies; and, for the firſt, he preuented their recouery of Amphipolis, a city on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus the ſonne of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argæus loſt, hauing the greateſt part of his Army ſlaine in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remained vnbroken, tooke the aduantage of a ſtrong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet auoiding thereby the preſent fury of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquiſhers life and liberty to returne into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this clemency hee was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

§. III.

The good ſucceſſe which Philip had in many enterpriſes.

NOw had Philip leaſure to looke Northward; and to attend the Illyrians and Pœonians, his irreconcileable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with ſo ſo proſperous ſucceſſe, as he ſlew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with ſeuen thouſand of his Nation, & therby recouered all thoſe places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc't that country, and after a maine victory obtained, he enforc't them to pay him tribute. This was no ſooner done, than (without ſtaying to take longer breath) he haſted ſpeedily towards Lariſſa, vpon the riuer Peneus in Theſſaly, of which Towne he ſoon made himſelfe maſter; & therby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made vſe in time following. Now although he reſolued either to ſubdue the Theſſalians, or to make them his owne againſt all others, becauſe the horſe-men of that Country were the beſt, and moſt feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it moſt for his ſafety to cloſe vp the entrances out of Thrace, leaſt while he inuaded Theſſaly and Greece towards the South, thoſe ample Nations, lying towards the North, ſhould either withdraw him, or ouer-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, ſeated on the famous Riuer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He alſo recouered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the city of Crenides (ſometime Datus,) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epiſtles. This place, wherein Philippi ſtood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the aduancement of Philips affaires, he drew yearly a thouſand talents, which make ſixe hundred thouſand French Crownes.

And that he might with the more eaſe disburden the Thracian ſhores of the Athenian Garriſons, to which he had giuen a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians; whom the better to faſten vnto him, he gaue them the City of Pydna with the Territory, meaning nothing leſſe than that they ſhould enioy it, or their owne Eſtate, many yeares.

Now that he might by degrees win ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occaſion to deliuer the City of Pheres in Theſſaly, from the tyrants Lycophron & Tiſiphonus: who, after they had conſpired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vſurped vpon the liberty of that State, they themſelues (Alexander being murdered) held it alſo by the ſame ſtrong hand and oppreſſion that Alexander did, till by the aſſiſtance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres reſtored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for euer after faſten the Theſſalians vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, binde them to his ſeruice.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian Warre which firſt drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the ſecond yeare of the hundred and ſixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Mantinæa, and about the eighth yeare of Artaxerxes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occaſions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of euery great alteration in the World there is ſome preceding preparation, though not at the firſt eaſily diſcerned; ſo did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians, conceiued againſt the Phocians, not onely teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wreſt the ſword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themſelues, beating downe their own defences, to giue him an eaſie paſſage; & beating themſelues, to giue him victory without perill, left nothing vnperformed towards their owne ſlauery, ſauing the title and impoſition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proud by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Eſtates of Greece; in which, at that time, they ſwayed moſt, they cauſed both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater ſummes of mony than they could well beare; the one for ſurprizing the Caſtle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being reſolued not to obey this Edict, were ſecretly ſet on and incouraged by the Lacedæmonians: and for refuſall were expoſed as Sacrilegers, and accurſed to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to inuade, and deſtroy them at their pleaſures.

The Phocians perſwaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, caſt the ſame dice of hazzard that Cæſar after many Ages following did; but had not the ſame chance.

chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of compoſition, they reſolued to ſacke the Temple it ſelfe. For ſeeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had ſo much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worſe could not befall them than already was intended; they reſolued to take the gold with the ground, and either to periſh for all, or to preuaile againſt all that had commiſſion to call them to account. The treaſure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thouſand talents, which in thoſe daies ſerued them to wage a great many men; and ſuch was their ſucceſſe in the beginning of the war, as they won three great battailes againſt the Thebans, Theſſalians, and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus caſt himſelfe head-long ouer the Rockes.

In the meane while the cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themſelues againſt their bad neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themſelues to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the ſiege of Methone loſt one of his eyes. It is ſaid, That hee that ſhot him, did purpoſely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the ſhaft therof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for ſo he was called that gaue him the wound. This City he euened with the ſoile. Plut. in Vlpian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians ingaged in the holy war, entred Theſſaly with new forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Army, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped ſo to entertaine the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leaſure to inuade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſaly; but both the Theſſalians, and Macedonians, (Philip being preſent) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſaly, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame victorious Army brake the forces of the Bœotians, and tooke from them their City of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late miſaduenture, after he had re-enforced his Army, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſaly, there to find againe the honour which he lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twenty thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Army ouerturned, ſixe thouſand ſlaine, and three thouſand taken: of which number himſelfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Thoſe that fled, were in part receiued by the Athenian Gallies, which ſailed alongſt the coaſt, commanded by Chares; but the greateſt number of thoſe that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they recouered them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Theſſaly, and Pheres made free as before.

Of the Olynthian warre. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FRom hence Philip reſolued to inuade Phocis it ſelfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his enterance into thoſe parts; and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedæmonians, they retrencht his paſſage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very ſtrong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is ſaid, that Philip hauing put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntas had three ſons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other ſonnes by Gygæa: but Philips elder brothers by the ſame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himſelf alſo of the reſt) the two yonger held themſelues within Olynthus; & that the receiuing of them by the Olynthians was the cauſe of the war, Iuſtine affirmeth. But iuſt quarrels are ballanced by iuſt Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might ſerue his turne; all his affections, & paſſions, how diuers ſoeuer in other men, were in his ambition ſwallowed vp, and therinto conuerted. Iuſt. l. 8.

For

For he neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelity; hee esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter: Nor any City or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subiection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, til he had incloſed all the power they had within their owne Walls, he entred their Territory, and by the aduantage of a well-compounded and trained Army, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere he sate down before the City it selfe: which done, hee bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Country and Common-weale, by whose treason hee entred the Towne, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the inhabitants for slaues by the drumme. By the spoile of this place he greatly enriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was he aduised by the Oracle in the beginning of his vndertaking, That he should make his assaults with siluer speares: Whereupon Horace well and truely said, Hor. lib. 3. Od. 16.

——Diffidit Vrbium

Reges muneribus.——

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates asunder,
And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conqueſt was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine:) So when in the contention between the Competitors, for the kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitratour, he came not to the Counsell accompanied with Piety and Iustice, but with a powerfull Army, and hauing beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

§. VI.

How Philip ended the Phocian warre.

THe warre still continued betweene the Phocians, and the Associates of the holy warre, the Bœotians, finding themselues vnable to subsist without some present aide; sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure themselues; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred & foureſcore thousand crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Bœotia it selfe, they then besought Philip of Macedon that he would assist them in person, to whom they would giue an entrance into their Territory, and in all things obey his Commandements in war.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to giue the law to both, & so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Bœotia, where being arriued, Phallechus who commanded the Phocian Army, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaning the Phocians to the mercy of the Conquerour; and for conclusion he had the glory of that warre called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten years; and, besides the glory, he possest himself of Orchomene, Coronea, & Corsia, in the country of the Bœotians, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselues. He brought the Phocians into seruitude, & wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, reseruing vnto himselfe the yearly tribute of threescore talents, which make sixe & thirty thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of piety for seruice of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctiones, phyctiones which the Phocians had, with the superintendency of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacriledge.

How Philip with ill successe attempted vpon Perinthus, Byzantium and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Army Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuennes. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his fury. Perinthus was a City of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolued to defend their liberty against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip sate downe before it with a puissant Army, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious assaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to vveary them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and mony, & succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they vvere relieued from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoeuer was wanting to their necessity. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gaue them often and ready helpe; Philip remoued the one halfe of his Army and besieged it, leauing fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vndertake diuers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon hee made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, & that by the occasion offered they might greatly aduantage their conditions: Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence preuailed in the refusall. In the meane while, Philip hauing digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mœsia, set on him in his return, vvounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip ouerthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Charonea, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMong these Northern Nations (part of which he suppresst, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was by his great aduantage inuited againe by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa hauing disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans & Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissonians, the rest were not of themselues able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluing vpon this enterprise; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other dissvvasion than a mastring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Army forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wan Platæa, and brought into subiection all that Region.

The rest, & especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storme would fall on themselues, yet were they dissvvaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (hauing drawne the Thebans to ioyne with them) to leaue the enioying of their estates estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could far more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat vnto them (with words mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction hee was at this time in disgrace, and not imployed (no so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although fo thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold vp the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip so shining a victory that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interiacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt; so it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for euer lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disaduantage) to the end he might obtaine the Soueraignty ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronæa, as he also forbare to attempt any thing against their City: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed ouer the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soone after (according vnto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soueraignty) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, & contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and vnder the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same ouer the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the warre. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he receiued such another conuertible riddle, as Cræsus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to inuade Persia, abuse his iudgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he vnderstood to be deliuered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he inuited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he receiued much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For hauing refused to doe iustice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then left to bee carnally abused by diuers base persons: this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, hee drew a sword from vnder his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had liued sixe and forty yeares, and reigned fiue and twenty. Iustine reports it, that Olympais incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly auowed, by the honour she did vnto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities, and issue.

NOw although hee were then taken from the World, when hee had mastred all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here-herein happy that he liued to see his son Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe bin an eye-witnesse of his resolution, and singular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plaine a patterne of the buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than the beginnings vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recouery of Macedon it selfe, in competition between him and the sonnes of Æropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the re-gaining of many places possest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the ouer-throw of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subiection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and won vpon them; He left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and iudgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crownes, than himselfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King, but the King, without Parmenio neuer did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselues.

Of this Prince it is hard to iudge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature & his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For, besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this fauour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieued, than to suppresse them. Whereof (among many other) we finde a good example in his dealing with Aradion, and Nicanor, whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; He answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them, that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in euery mans owne power to be well spoken off; and thus was shortly prooued, for after Philip relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Physitian for euill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred to Cicero, and Gellius; and by Dion, and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his reigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for, Amyntas the sonne of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his Daughter Cyna, who had by him a Daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base sonne Aridæus, her Vncle by the Mothers-side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridæus, by extreame torments: Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Vncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slaine at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicasipolis, the Sister of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her Father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a Daughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers brest.

By Thessa and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom after he had gotten with childe, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie King of Egypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine,

Chap. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

Lexander, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, vvell instructed, and inriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and seuenteene yeares after Rome vvas built, and after his owne birth twenty yeares. The strange dreames of Philip his father, and that one of the gods in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as fooliſh tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a vvorke the most magnificent of the World) vvas burnt vpon the day of his birth, & that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three seuerall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkeable, & might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbor-Nations, whom Philip had oppreſt, began to consult about the recouery of their former liberty, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders young-years gaue them hope of preuailing, & his suspected seuerity increased courage in those, who could better resolue to die, than to liue slauishly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily haue endangered the health of his Estate. For after reuenge taken vpon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe, & the celebration of his Funerals, he first fastened vnto him his own Nation, by freeing them from all exactions & bodily slauery, other than their seruice in his Wars; and vsed such kingly austerity towards those that contemned his young yeares, and such clemency to the rest that perswaded themselues of the cruelty of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, he made a present iourny into Peloponnesus, & so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Councell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Persians, vpon which war Philip had not only resolued, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported vnder the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Army, to recouer some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections, those faire marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking; all other thoughts & imaginations were either grieuous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth, for he receiueth aduertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had vnited themselues against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recouery of their former freedome. Hereto they vvere perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being therto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the deuice he vsed was more subtile than profitable; for he caused it to be bruited that Alexander was slaine in a battaile against the Triballes, & brought into the assembly a Companion whom he had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeed a certaine Doctrine of Policy (as Policy is now a-dayes defined by falshood & knauery) that deuised rumors & lies, if they serue the turn, but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Wars; but in all that I haue obserued, I haue found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that find themselues at one time abused by such like bruits, do at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perillous, summoned to assemble, so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumpery, and for them, fear vpon necessary occasions to entertaine the truth it selfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly & famous Gracians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered. But, that cannot endure to striue against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which he purposeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile them.

89 He therefore made such expedition towards these Reuolters, as that himselfe, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be receiued again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resoluing; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wisemen are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himselfe in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same termine end.

And hauing now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolued to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Penes, 90 Getes, Agrians, and other saluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessours, but euen Philip his Father: with all which, after diuers ouerthrowes giuen them, he made peace, or else brought them into subiection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet finde the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Grecians had enioyed it ouer-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteth to their succour, and presents himselfe with thirty thousand foot, all old souldiers, & three thousand horse, before the City, & giue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the desire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeed, 30 he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to serue himselfe elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would onely deliuer into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should haue made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be deliuered vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces, could eyther haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailant, they are charged at the backe by the Macedonian Garrison, their City taken and razed to 40 the ground, sixe thousand slaine, and thirty thousand sold for slaues, at the price of foure hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gracian Cities.

Many Arguments were vsed by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to beleeue that they were rather misled by giuing hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City, yea that his Ancestour Hercules was borne therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggrauate them. Yet for the honour 50 he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatned to take her life vnlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had receiued into their city so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this reuolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to feare the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines; wherein he was exceeding ill aduised, had not his fortune, or rather the prouidence of God, made all the resistance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Grecians betooke themselues to the seruice of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he inuaded.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians vpon the Riuer of Granicus.

WHen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being ready to dis-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their own Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselues were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and fiue thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neere vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne sacrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, he put to death without any offence giuen him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly aduanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by vniust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fel out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the iustice of God; for all that he had planted, was soone after withered, & rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous, his brother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the graue, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as hauing stiled him his seruant on a letter which he wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gaue order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesse Asia, that they should take Alexander aliue, whip him with rods, and then conuey him to his presence: that they should sinke his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red Sea, belike into Aethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica.

In this sort did this glorious king, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, & brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their king were wont to preuaile against those of lesse courage than themselues, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and siluer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuasion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselues with yron and steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, euen the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled euery of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazzard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselues with the gold and iewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the king, who had power to constraine them in assembling themselues for his seruice, but their owne feares and cowardise, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they onely then obeyed, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did iustly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles praelium cupit, ita formidat inexercitus; nam sciendum est in pugnâ vsum amplius prodesse quam vires; As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must vnderstand, that in fight it more auailes to haue beene accustomed vnto the like, than onely to haue rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discouered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his Story, That it was hard to iudge, whether his daring to vndertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the Riuer of Granick, which seuereth the Territorie of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and banke of the Riuer to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vnto, and scale from the Leuel of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. But it seemes to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slaine, were rather kil'd in the backe, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and fiue hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not haue bought their liues at so small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhoesaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie; though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselues in one body vpon a peece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance hauing beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelue Foot-men, and two and twenty Horse-men?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granicke.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terrour vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuasions, where the Nations inuaded haue once beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines; they will soone haue perswaded themselues, that such an enemy vpon equall tearmes and euen ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therfore Machiauels counsell, That he which resolueth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the ways. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted, and yet lightly some one place wil be found that is defended very weakely. How often haue the Alpes giuen way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we find that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they giue no security to those that lye behinde them: for they are of too large extent. The townes of Lombardie perswaded themselues that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French king from descending into the Dutchie of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a seruice, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lombardie, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arriuall. What shall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such sort, as they leaue but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopylae, haue seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if euer) haue they beene attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyle; Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soeuer they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-side. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that beare good witnesse. The deepest haue many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath men now to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enow to beare his enemie; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by striuing in vaine to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his owne disaduantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainely, if a Riuer were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is diuided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea, had beene safe enough against the Romans, inuading it vnder conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, & not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Wherby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could be hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough, the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the Riuer of Granicke in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seeke an easier way, nor labouring to conuey his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For, hauing beaten them vpon their owne ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leauing no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such vnable Protectors.

Soone after this victory he recouered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesia, which vvere rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he receiued vvith great grace, suffering them to be gouerned by their owne lawes. For he obserued it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus vtilis clementia fama; It is commodious vnto such as lay the foundations of a new Soueraignty, to haue the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastred Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene cast out of all that she held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her son and successour; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subiecting vnto him Pisidia, he directed himselfe towards Darius (who was said to be aduanced towards him with a marueilous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Asia the lesse, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victorie layed vnder his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and setling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captaines in Peloponnesus; and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas seated on the Riuer Meander, vvhich vvas abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was giuen vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a City called Gordium, the Regall seate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, he cut it a sunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promise to him that could vntie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophesie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed vnto two of his Captaines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most conuenient for that seruice; and deliuering vnto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Angori, standing on the same Riuer of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Armie, and then then entred Paphlagonia, vvhose people submitted themselues vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouernor with one Regiment of Macedonians latelyarriued.

Hee hauing vnderstood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, vvhich heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this onely Captaine he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of kingdoms and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, conuerted the fearefull passions of his own followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits haue bin stirred vp in sundry Ages of the vvorld, and in diuers parts therof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certaine ends, vvhich the infinite Spirit of the Vniuersall, piercing, moving, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainely the things that this king did were maruellous, and would hardly haue bin vndertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would haue contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not haue discouered the Riuer of Indus: as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may iustly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountred by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meere length of tedious iournies could make, vvere like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it vvrought. But he that vvould finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountring vvorthy Captaines, and those better followed than themselues, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and still preuailed ouer those, that would not haue yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome liue to obtaine great Empires. For it is a vvorke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardy & well-ordered State, than to tread down and vtterly subdue a multitude of seruile Nations, compounding the body of a grosse vnweildy Empire. Wherefore these Parua Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, saue only that braue Roman, Cæsar.

Hauing thus farre digressed, it is now time that we returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror, who is trauailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recouer the Streights therof before Darius should arriue there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which he had recouered in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well aduised himselfe; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaines in the Warres, as he doth of the spoiles, shall neuer be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselues vvith the purchase of glory, as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and siluer.

The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, vvhich were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, he began ouerlate to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres aduised him to waste all the prouisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, & alwayes to giue ground to the Inuader, till he found some such notable aduantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is best broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselues in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to giue or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance haue saued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest incouragements giuen by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men, but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his kingdome. Pericles though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazzard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that haue perished by aduenturing in their own countries, to charge an inuading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when he gaue Cæsar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captaines he aduentured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound iudgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prouence, by vvasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armie of the Prince of Orange in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the aduice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Country, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois set vpon king Edward at Chessie; and King Iohn (when the English were well-neere tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue beene wasted to nothing) constrained the blacke Prince with great furie, neere Poitiers, to ioyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fift of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbeare blowes, and followed his aduice, which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smoake; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward vvas vvont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-liued, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound aduice. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason haue brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne, or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia & Paphlagonia bin wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arsenes, Gouernor of that Prouince, with the best of his forces: hunger would not haue suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not haue bin maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leisure haue bin so throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should haue beene broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull trauaile.

But Arsenes leauing a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to find himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. He should rather haue aduentured his person in custody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps haue saued the Prouince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, vvould haue beene conueighed into ſtrong Townes. So ſhould his Armie, if it were driuen from the place of aduantage, haue found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himſelfe with his horſe-men haue had the leſſe worke in deſtroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cauſe to wiſh for Alexanders comming, and as great cauſe to the Keepers of the paſſage not to hinder it. For cowards are wiſe in apprehending all formes of danger. Theſe Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arſenes made all haſte to ioyne himſelfe with Darius, burning downe all as he went, like one deſpairing of the defence, began to grow circumſpect, and to thinke that ſurely their Generall, who gaue as loſt the Countrie behind their backes, had expoſed themſelues vnto certaine death, as men that vvere good for nothing elſe but to dull the Macedonian ſwords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they ſaw that Arſenes himſelfe could well forbeare) they ſpeedily followed the foot-ſteps of their Generall, gleaning after his Harueſt. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardiſe of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had beene alienated from the Perſian ſide by their indiſcretion.

§. IIII.

Of the vnwarlike Armie leuied by Darius againſt Alexander. The vnaduiſed courſes which Darius took in this Expedion. He is vanquiſhed at Iſſus, where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made priſoners. Of ſome things following the battaile of Iſſus.

IN the meane ſeaſon Darius approched, who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetie thouſand Souldiers, out of diuers Nations; Iuſtine muſters them at three hundred thouſand Foot, and a hundred thouſand Horſe; Plutarch at ſixe hundred thouſand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius deſcribes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to ſet out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his own ſafety, perſwading himſelfe, as it ſeemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and ſumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire, which the Perſians worſhipped, attended by their Prieſts, and after them three hundred and threeſcore and fiue young-men, anſwering the number of the daies of the yeare, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Iupiter drawne with white Horſes, with their Riders cloathed in the ſame colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horſe of the Sunne: Next after theſe follow ten ſumptuous Chariots, in-laied and garniſht with ſiluer and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horſe, compounded of twelue ſeuerall Nations, which the better to auoid confuſion, did hardly vnderſtand each others language, and theſe marſhalled in the head of the reſt, being beaten, might ſerue very fitly to diſorder all that followed them; in the taile of theſe Horſes the Regiment of foot marched, with the Perſians called immortall, becauſe if any died, the number was preſently ſupplied: & theſe were armed with chaines of gold, & their coates with the ſame mettall imbrodered, whereof the ſleeues were garniſhed with pearle; baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perſwade them that it were great inciuilitie to cut and to deface ſuch glorious garments. But it was well ſaid: Sumptuosè indutus miles, ſi virtute ſuperiorem alijs non exiſtimet, cum in prælijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non veſtimentis muniri, quoniam hoſtes veſtibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth thoſe in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparrell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought againſt the Samnites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all ſware eyther to preuaile or dy, thirty thouſand of them hauing apparrelled themſelues in white garments, with high creſts and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aſide all feare: Non enim criſtas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata ſcuta tranſire Romanum pilum; For theſe plumed creſts would wound no body, and the Romane pile would bore holes in painted and gilded ſhields.

To ſecond this Court-like company, fifteene thouſand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparrelled like Women (belike to breed the more terrour) & theſe were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinſmen. Then came Darius himſelfe, himselfe,the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe,riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation,cast and cut in pure gold;these the Macedonians did not serue,but they serued their turnes of these,by changing their massie-bodies into portable and currant coyne. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols,couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same mettall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius sate,had a couering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the king was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Launces plated with siluer,and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian bloud, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his own person, two hundred of the bloud Royall; bloud too Royall and precious to be spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellowes, like the Switzers, would haue done him more seruice) and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the king, which if he had meant to haue vsed, he would haue marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sisygambis the kings Mother, and by his Wife,drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-backe, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, and the wiues of the Nobility,waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparrelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had bin Comedians or Tumblers; for this troope was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the kings treasure, charged on fiue hundred Mules,and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the May-game-King into the field,incumbred with a most vnnecessary traine of Strumpets,attended with troupes of diuers Nations, speaking diuers languages,and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate,and so rich in gold and in garments,as the same could not but haue encouraged the naked'st Nation of the vvorld against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue,of Religion, of Libertie, and whatsoeuer else hath bin vvont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier,in comparison of spoyle and riches. The rich ships are boorded vpon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, & the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English nation haue attempted many places in the Indies,and run vpon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets; vvhich, had they bin put to it vpon the like disaduantages in Ireland,or in any poore Country,they would haue turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders,contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made vvillingly,and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations;for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, do rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die(as they call it)honourably. Car on n'a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y vapas. No man makes haste to the market,where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsaiers, he vvould haue satisfied himselfe by the out-sides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailes of Beasts for successe. For leauing the description of this second battell(which is indeed no-where wel described,neither for the confusion & hastie running away of the Asians could it be) we haue enough by the slaughter that was made of them,& by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were slaine in this battaile,with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or(as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen,with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter,fortie thousand taken prisoners,while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred & fourescore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I do verily beleeue,that this small number rather died with the ouer-trauaile and paines-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes receiued from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate & the basest of the World)had had any succour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would neuer haue sold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the kings children; had their owne honour beene valued by them at nothing, and the kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of diuers Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would deuoure, than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, vvell couered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great aduantage, vvould make so little accompt of his delicate Persians, louing their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and vvorse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (hauing so great aboundance of treasure to do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him ouerlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so vnpleasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Grecian should be presently slaine: vvho while he vvas a sundring in the Tormentors hand, vsed this speech to the king, That Alexander, against whom he had giuen this good counsell, should assuredly reuenge his death, and lay deserued punishment vpon Darius for despising his aduice.

It vvas the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita fortunatæ sunt, vt asperæ quæ vtilia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiant; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, whose eares iudge all that is profitable to be too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is vnpleasant.

Fit libertie in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilij est eius vita, & essentia, quæ erepta consilium euanescit;

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice giuen him by the Grecian Souldiers that serued him, vvho intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had vvith the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men bin able to haue opposed the furie of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, vnder their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order, in despight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: vve reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits haue bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in vvhich they haue serued, hath bin broken.

At the battaile of Rauenna, vvhere the Imperialls vvere beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndismayed; vvhom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemures, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not entire by their escape, he was ouer-turned and slaine in the place. For it is truely said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali opus ipsum quantumuis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selfe, how hard soeuer it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which, the mischiefe hanging ouer their heads, may bring: and as truely of those that know the warres but by heare-say; Quod valentes sunt & prævalentes ante periculum, in ipsis tamen periculis deficiunt; They haue abilitie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retract, aduised Darius to retire his Army into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might haue inuironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to diuide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might haue fought many battailes, and haue brought no greater numbers at once than might haue beene well marshalled & conducted. But this counsel was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuiron the Grecians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking vnderstanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither giue nor discerne of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a streightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perswaded him to leaue in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Iewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserued, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wiues and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to sixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion fiue hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leauing his brother dead, with diuers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow giuen vnto Darius, all Phœnicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Strato, Zidon, and Biblos, maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heeles; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately reuolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leuied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselues, were buried there, for the time was not yet come to diuide Kingdomes.

Alexander to honour Ephestion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose of the kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could beare his prosperity with the same moderation, & quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduersitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a signe that he did but accompany, and could not gouerne his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he receiued a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, then one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had receiued an ouerthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornefull answer vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring so that of Darius had already cast leafe; the one a resolued well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himselfe.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander comming neere to the Citie of Tyre, receiued from them the present of a golden Crowne, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he tooke very thankefully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was scarce in the old Citie adioyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolued to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, hauing great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betweene the Iland and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a storme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne asunder; yet with the helpe of his Nauie, which arriued (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and preuailed, after he had spent seuen moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserued for slaues (saith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that serued Alexander, conueyed great numbers away by shipping vnto their owne Citie. Arrian.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken: for one of the Tyrians hauing dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him againe. Iustin. l. 18.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled vp the channell, that lay betweene the Iland and the Maine.

The gouernement of this Territorie he gaue to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant vnder Parmenio; Ephesius had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deales cruelly with the Iewes.

IN the meane while Darius sends againe to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him, by threatning to encompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Riuers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other feareful things: for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enow of that nature to present vnto another. All the kingdomes betweene the Riuer of Alys, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victory and his own vertue had possest him of; That he was to giue conditions, and not to receiue any, & that he hauing passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of resistance in transporting himself ouer Riuers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the king, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Gotis a faithfull seruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander receiued a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; He found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forc't to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis, (whom Iosephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Assailants, he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to be drawne about the street, whilest he was yet aliue, who being as valiant a man as himselfe, disdained to aske him either life or remission of his torments. And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes some what to couer her deformity.

Lib. 11. c. vlt. From Gaza (saith Iosephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Iaddus the high Priest, being subiect and sworne to Darius, had refused him. The Iewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being caught by God, issued out of the Citie couered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an vpper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuites in their rich ornaments, & the people in white garments, in a manner so vnusuall, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iosephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoeure it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Iosephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as Iaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended onely by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phenicians, (who hoped to haue sackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gaue the Iewes all, and more than they desired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to liue vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and inioy their owne Religion.

§. VIII.

Alexander winnes Egypt: and makes a iournie to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, receiued him and deliuered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the king of Persia, who had more of affection than of iudgment, gaue to the valianteſt man he had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest coward the gouernment of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to trauaile after God-head, towards Iupiter Hammon; so foolish had prosperitie made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but haue perished, had not a maruellous showre of raine fallen vpon him, when his Armie was in extreame despaire. All men that know Egypt, and haue written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast desarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the armie; who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Armie was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Iupiters Temple.

Arrian. l. 3. Arrianus from the report of Ptolemie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that haue written the Storie of Alexander, as, That an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Ereopus, practised by Darius to haue slaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensiue engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies haue many such prety tales; telling how they haue bin assisted in battaile, by the presence of our Lady, & by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselues do hardly beleeue. The strangest thing that I haue read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouara, all the Dogges which followed the French Army, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their liues, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperiall Switzers vtterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Iupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom & the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, & the Riuer of Nilus, are interiacent; and on the North he ioynes it to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, liue (saith he) vpon the spoyles of shipwracke: wheras the temple or groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Ptol. Af. Tab. 3.

When Alexander came neere the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be giuen in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition; who affected the title of Iupiters son. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Deuils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defectiue in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to say O paidion, he said O pai dios, that is; O sonne of Iupiter, in stead of, O deare sonne: for which Grammaticall errour he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spred, that the great Iupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one, when he was imployed against Gorgon, The other against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing these men had deriued themselues from the gods, why might not he? By this it seemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeed he made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to giue answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should bee pleasing to Iupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams-head, I see that many wise men haue troubled themselues to find out; but, as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who liued, saith St. Augustine, in Moses time) Ea quæ de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiosè perueſtiganda; Wee must not ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients haue written of their gods, Curt. lib. 4.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to be preached in the World, the Deuill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but giue credit, because I haue heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very vnskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon hee returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammones, who, belike vnderstanding that hee affected the title of Iupiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saue good men.

He gaue the charge of the seuerall Prouinces of Egypt to seuerall Gouernours, fol-Arist. Pol. l. 5. lowing the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therin the Romane Emperors also followed, not daring to commit the gouernment of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank & degree. He then gaue order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And hauing now setled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily haue redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a Riuer for the swiftnesse therof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius easily haue repelled the inuading Macedo-
Curt. l. 4 nian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waighty stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round & well polished by continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the riuer, otherwise than by ioyning their hands and enterlacing their armes together, making one waighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deep towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should haue made head, as the footmen were inforc't to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keep them from being moistned, and made vnseruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and vnderstandingly said of Homer,

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.

The mindes of men are euer so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of mis-gouernment haue beene subiect to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feauer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderstanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recouered the Easterne shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces he durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forsooke the aduantage which no valour of his enemies could easily haue ouercome. But it is commonly seene, that fearfull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all prouisions a fire wherwith the Macedonians might serue themselues ouer Tigris, thinking therby greatly to haue distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saued and recouered. This, Mazeus might haue done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not haue pursued them, leauing the strength of their foot out of sight, and far behind.

The new prouisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battaile of Arbela.

Darius, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arriued; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather serued to make vp the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all ſorts ten hundred thouſand, and of horſe foure hundred thouſand, beſides armed Chariots, and ſome few Elephants. Curtius who muſters the Army of Darius at two hundred thouſand foote, and neere fifty thouſand horſe, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet ſeeing hee had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaſſalls, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all ſorts ſome three or foure hundred thouſand, with which he hoped in thoſe faire plaines of Aſſyria, to haue ouer-borne the few numbers of the inuading Army. But it is a Rule in the Philoſophy of the War;

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quàm ars & exercitium ſolent præſtare vegi. victoriam; In euery battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gaue reſt to his Army after the paſſage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipſe of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cauſe and reaſon, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine preſage of their ouerthrow and deſtruction, in ſo much as they began not only to murmur, but to ſpeake it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that diſdained Philip for his Father, and would needs be called the Son of Iupiter, they ſhould all periſh; For he not only inforc't them to make warre againſt Worlds of enemies, but againſt Riuers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themſelues.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Aſtrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be aſſured that this defection of the Moon was a certaine preſage of good ſucceſſe; for, that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reſerued the knowledge to themſelues, ſo as a ſorry Almanack-maker had been no ſmall foole in thoſe daies.

Of this kind of ſuperſtitious obſeruation Cæſar made good vſe, when he fought againſt Ariouiſtus and the Germans: for they being perſwaded by the caſting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they ſhould certainely loſe the battaile, Cæſar forc't them to abide it, though they durſt not giue it; wherin hauing their minds already beaten by their owne ſuperſtition, and being reſolutely charged by the Romanes, the whole Army in effect periſhed.

Theſe Egyptians gaue no other reaſon than this, That the Grecians were vnder the aſpect of the Sun, the Perſians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the ſtate of Perſia was now in danger of falling, and their glory being obſcured. This iudgment of the Egyptian Prieſts being noyſed through all the Army, all were ſatisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuiſed ſince, was well obſerued then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine leade his Army to the fight, when it is poſſeſſed with matter of terrour.

It is truely obſerued by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing ſo much as by ſuperſtition; yea, wee finde it in all ſtories, and often in our owne, that by ſuch inuentions, deuiſed tales, dreames, and propheſies, the people of this Land haue been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and inſurrections, and ſtill to their owne loſſe and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Perſian Army, certaine letters were ſurprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perſwading them for great ſummes of mony, either to kill or betray Alexander. But theſe by the aduice of Parmenio he ſuppreſſed,

At this time alſo Darius his faire Wife, oppreſt with ſorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander ſeemed no leſſe to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the firſt bruit, ſuſpected that ſome diſhonourable violence had beene offered her; but being ſatisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly reſpect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he deſired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Maſter of the Perſian Empire, then it would pleaſe them to conferre on ſo iuſt and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again before the laſt triall by battell offered theſe conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp & reſigne all Aſia the leſſe, & with Egypt, all thoſe Kingdoms between the Phœnician Sea, & the Riuer of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranſome of his Mother, and his other Daughters 30. thouſand thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leaue his son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be remoued, aduised with his Counsell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates & Hellespont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, & the treasure offered for them of far better vse than their persons, with diuers other arguments; all which Alexander reiected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his aduice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might haue liued as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himselfe a Successor of able age to haue enioyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to assure themselues of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a iust & prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a louer of wine, of his owne flattery, and of extream cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obserued, the taint of one vniust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoeuer he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own naturall clemency and magnanimity, without all respect to their Master, but thankes to an enemy was improper; that he made no warres against aduersity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of mony to perswade his friends to attempt vpon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise & faithful) resolue in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret & base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back againe ouer Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then beleeue that he offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the War which he had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, & not to receiue; That the Heauens could not hold two Suns: and therfore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to giue him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

WIth this answer the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, & sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he neuer dared yet so much as to hazzard. Alexander consults with his Captaines, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Campe by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Macedonians, being but few. Alexander disdaines to steale the victory, and resolues to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell giuen by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessariò cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers & trenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode; for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validiùs resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis magis pugnat, quàm ferrum exercitus; Souldiers doe the better stand to it in fight, if they haue their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steele without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seuen thousand horse; these belike were of the Europæan Army: for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, & Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes vpon the Riuer of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a grat saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumq; victoribus auget, & aduersarijs aufert; One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that haue already had the better, taking spirit quite from those that haue been beaten.

Diodorus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; The tell vs of many charges and re-charges, That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valourous encounters on both sides, Fortune her selfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuers vs in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work, saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arrianus findes not a third part of this number slaine; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius,) thirty thousand according to Arrianus: Ninety thousand, if we beleeue Diodorus. But what can we iudge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians vpon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians pursued: For if of these foure or fiue hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had cast but a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not haue bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as sixe or seuen hundred men in three victorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander vpon the bankes of Euphrates, & had armed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to haue past that riuer so easily, much lesse the riuer of Tigris. But a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, he abandoned all places of aduantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowels of his kingdome, as all hope & possibility of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choice, either of death or victory; to which election Darius could no way constraine his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that inuaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yelding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recouered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoile & riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approued.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arriues at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had beene twice beaten, should rather haue sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neere the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might haue brought it after him at leisure; but being ouercome, he knew it vnpossible to driue Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himselfe, at the ouerthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et præterita magis reprehendi possunt quàm corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, whereof Mazeus, in whom Darius had moſt confidence, rendred himſelfe, his Children and the City. Alſo the Captaine of the Caſtle, who was keeper of the treaſure, ſtrewed the ſtreets with flowers, burnt frankincence vpon Altars of ſiluer as Alexander paſſed by, and deliuered vnto him whatſoeuer was committed to his truſt. The Magi (the Chaldean Aſtrologers) followed this Captaine in great ſolemnity to entertaine their new King: after theſe came the Babylonian horſemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene theſe (though not greatly to be feared) and himſelfe, Alexander cauſed his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entred the Caſtle, he admired the glory thereof, and the aboundance of treaſure therein found, amounting to fifty thouſand talents of ſiluer vncoyned. The City it ſelfe I haue elſewhere deſcribed, with the Wals, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderfull place of pleaſure about two miles in Circuit, ſurrounded with a Wall of foureſcore foote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is ſaid that one of the Kings of Babylon cauſed to be built, that the Queen and other Princeſſes might walke priuately therein. In this City, rich in all things, but moſt of all in voluptuous pleaſures, the King reſted himſelfe and the whole Army foure and thirty dayes, conſuming that time in banquetting and in all ſorts of effeminate exerciſe, which ſo much ſoftned the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted til now with the like delicacies, as the ſeuere diſcipline of war which taught them the ſufferances of hunger and thirſt, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Arr. l. Alex.

Here it was that thoſe bands of a thouſand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were ſtiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour thoſe Captains which were found by certain ſelected iudges to haue deſerued beſt in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies conſiſted but of fiue hundred. Certainly the drawing downe of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cauſe (ſaith the Marſhall Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath been beſtowed on euery Picque Rouſſ or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foot had a thouſand Souldiers vnder one Enſigne, and after that fiue hundred, as in the time of Francis the firſt, the title was honourable, and the Kings were leſſe charged, and farre better ſerued. K. Henry the eight of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ſhips, but to men of known valour, and of great eſtate, nay ſometime he made two Gentlemen of quality Commanders in one ſhip; but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great ſupply out of Europe, for Antipater ſent him ſixe thouſand foote and fiue hundred horſe out of Macedon, of Thracians three thouſand foot, & the like number of horſe; & out of Greece foure thouſand and foure hundred horſe, by which his Army was greatly ſtrengthened: for thoſe that were infected with the pleaſures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, De quitter la plume pour dormir ſur la dure; To change from ſoft beds to hard boords.

He left the Caſtle and City of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Apollidorus; to ſupply all wants, a thouſand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the City vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bagiſtanes that gaue vp the Caſtle, and hauing diſtributed to euery Souldier a part of the Treaſure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Prouince Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Suſa in Perſia, the ſame which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, ſituate on the Riuer Euleus, a City ſometime gouerned by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites alſo, Gouernour of this famous City, gaue it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thouſand talents of ſiluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all other the treaſures of Darius. In this ſort did thoſe Vaſſals of fortune, louers of the Kings proſperity, not of his perſon, (for ſo all ambitious men are) purchaſe their own peace and ſafety with the Kings treaſures. And herein was Alexander well aduiſed, that whatſoeuer titles he gaue to the Perſians, yet he left all places of importance in truſt with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Suſa, and Perſepolis, with other Cities and Prouinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet liuing) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobility of Perſia would haue returned vnto their naturall Lord. Thoſe that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are neuer to be vsed alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them, nor euer to be trusted with the defence of any frontier Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarre, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fonterabie, in the yeare 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might haue furnished the King from Babylon; and while he stayed foure and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abalites might haue holpen him from Suſa: & while he feasted there, Tiridates from Perſepolis might haue relieued him, for the great maſſe of treaſure was laid vp in that City. But who hath fought out a friendes fearfull aduerſity. It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honeſt: for thoſe that are but greedy of themſelues, doe in all changes of fortune onely conſult the conſeruation of their owne greatneſſe.

The gouernment of Suſa, with the Caſtle & Treaſure, he committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abalites, who rendred it vnto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giuing them titles, but neither truſt nor power; for he left three thouſand old Souldiers in Garriſon to aſſure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repoſe themſelues.

It is ſaid, that Charles the fift hauing promiſed Charles of Bourbon the gouernment of Marſeilles, if he could haue forc't it, & whereof he made ſure accompt, told ſome of his ſecret Counſellers, that he meant nothing leſſe than the performance of that promiſe, becauſe hee ſhould thereby haue left the Duke (reuolted from his Maſter) very well wherewithall to haue recouered his fauour.

How Alexander came to Perſepolis, and burnt it.

FRom Suſa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Perſepolis, and when he ſought to paſſe thoſe mountaines which ſunder Suſiana and Perſia, he was ſoundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended againſt him thoſe ſtraights, called Pylæ Perſidis, or Suſides, and after the loſſe of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc't to ſaue himſelfe by retrait, cauſing his Foot to march cloſe together, and to couer themſelues with their Targets from the ſtones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, liuing in that country, diſcouered vnto him, & came thereby ſuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforc't to fight vpon euen ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Perſepolis; but (after that they of Perſepolis had refuſed to receiue him) he returned & gaue a ſecond charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was ſlaine. In like maner did King Francis the firſt, in the year 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Switzers vndertaking to defend all the paſſages, who, if their footmanſhip had not ſaued them vpon the Kings deſcent on the other ſide, they had been ill paied for their hard lodging on thoſe Hils.

Foure thouſand Greekes, ſaith Curtius (Iuſtine numbers them but at eight hundred) hauing been taken priſoners by the Perſians, preſented themſelues to Alexander now in ſight of Perſepolis. Theſe had the barbarous Perſians ſo maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noſes, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way haue beene knowne to their Countri-men, but by their voices; to each of theſe Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garmentes, and ſuch Lands as they liked to liue vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his falſe hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Perſepolis was ready to receiue him, & prayed him to double his pace, becauſe there was a determination in the people to ſpoyle the Kings treaſure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants vpon Alexanders arriuall, and they that ſtaied followed the worſt counſell; for all was left to the liberty of the Souldiers, to ſpoyle and kill at their pleaſure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had bin layed in the ballance with Perſepolis, would haue waighed it downe. Babylon, indeed, and Suſa, were very rich; but in Perſepolis lay the bulke and maine ſtore of the Perſians. For after the ſpoyle that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and ſiluer, and other Iewels, there remained to Alexander himſelfe one hundred and twenty thouſand talents. He left the ſame number of three thouſand

Macedonians

Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, & gaue the same formall honor to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The body of his Army he left here for thirty dayes, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, he would needs goe in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse & foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire voluit, sed non potuit stare, He hath not a will to goe, but he is vnable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not endure the extreame frost, and make way, but with extreame difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his horse, & led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himselfe can endure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him; than his sometime forbearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine owne little iudgement I shall rather commend that Captain, that makes carefull prouision for those that follow him, & that seekes wisely to preuent extreame necessity, than those witlesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hauing endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cæsar made, or the best of the Romane Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own & all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was enflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle & City of Persepolis, to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, & thereby alien their hearts: For they might well beleeue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Curt. l. 5.

Sen. Epist. 83. In violentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it so fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he receiued a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to haue increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once againe to trie his fortune. Hetherfore cals together his Captaines and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime liued with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could neuer be beaten by any aduersity of the Kings, from the faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approued the Kings resolution. Two onely, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabarzanes and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselues to be an enemy: this preamble Nabarzanes vsed, and

and in concluſion aduiſed the election of his fellow Traitor Beſſus, with promiſe that the warres ended, the Empire ſhould againe be reſtored to Darius. The King ſwollen with diſdaine preſt towards Naburzanes to haue ſlain him, but Beſſus & the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the reſt, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himſelfe, and Beſſus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the reſt of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull ſeruant, perſwaded him to be aduiſed, and ſerue the time, ſeeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at leaſt make ſhew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle diſpoſition, willingly yeelded vnto. Beſſus makes his ſubmiſſion and attends the King, who remoues his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thouſand Greeks, which had in all the former Battailes ſerued Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retrait in ſpight of the Macedonians, offered himſelfe to guard his perſon, proteſting againſt the Treaſon of Beſſus; but it was not his deſtiny to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counſell, but he enclined ſtill to Beſſus, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by Alexander, and practiſed the diuiſion of his faithfull ſeruants. Beſſus had drawne vnto him thirty thouſand of the Army, promiſing them all thoſe things, by which the louers of the World and themſelues are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, ſafety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainely diſcouered the purpoſes of Beſſus, and being ouercome with paſſion, as thinking himſelfe vnable to make head againſt theſe vngratefull and vnnaturall Traitors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull ſeruant to depart from him, and to prouide for himſelfe. In like ſort he diſcharged the reſt of his attendants, all ſaue a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Perſians being moſt baſe cowards, durſt not vndertake his defence againſt the Bactrians, notwithſtanding that they had foure thouſand Greeks to ioyne with him, who had been able to haue beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forſakes himſelfe, no man followes. It had been farre more Man-like and King-like, to haue dyed in the head of thoſe foure thouſand Greeks, which offered him the diſpoſition of their liues, (to which Artabazus perſwaded him) than to haue lien bewailing himſelfe on the ground, and ſuffering himſelfe to be bound like a Slaue by thoſe ambitious Monſters that laid hand on him, whom neither the conſideration of his former great eſtate, nor the honour he had giuen them, nor the truſt repoſed in them, nor the world of benefits beſtowed on them, could moue to pitty: no, nor his preſent aduerſity, which aboue all things ſhould haue moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it; for infidelity hath no compaſſion.

Now Darius, thus forſaken, was bound & laid in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beaſts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be diſcouered; & to adde deſpight and deriſion to his aduerſity, they faſtned him with Chaines of Gold, and ſo drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Beſſus and Naburzanes perſwaded themſelues to redeeme their liues and the Prouinces they held, either by deliuering him a priſoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themſelues Kings by his ſlaughter, and then to defend themſelues by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was againſt the nature of God, who is moſt iuſt, to pardon ſo ſtrange villany, yea, though againſt a Prince purely Heatheniſh and an Idolater.

Alexander hauing knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durſt not abide his comming, haſtened after him with a violent ſpeede, and becauſe he would not force his foot-men beyond their powers, he mounted on horſ-back certain ſelected companies of them, & beſt armed, & with ſixe thouſand other horſe, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treaſon of Beſſus, and ſecretly forſooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beſſus took, and how neere he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his pace, and his Vant-gard being diſcouered by Beſſus his Reare, Beſſus brought a Horſe to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perſwading him to mount thereon, and to ſaue himſelfe. But the vnfortunate King refuſing to follow thoſe that had betrayed him, they caſt Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beaſts that drew him, & ſlew two poore Seruants that attended his perſon. This done, they all fled that could, leauing the reſt to the mercy of the Macedonian ſwords.

Polyſtratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuite of the vanquished preſt with thirſt, as hee was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discouered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to moue, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud: And by a Persian captiue which followed this Polystratus, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes vnheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his owne honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. He also, hauing nothing else to present, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, & Children, desiring the immortall gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he liued but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherwith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIV.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauels were neere an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments he therefore vsed to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his deuotion the Hyrcanians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, he wan their consents to go on: which done, leauing Craterus with certaine Regiments of foote, and Amyntas with sixe thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. He passeth the riuer of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sea: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe vnder-ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zeudracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselues to Alexander, and were restored to their places and gouernments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approued and constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fiue hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had serued Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arriued, but in the end they render themselues simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedæmonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader hauing slaine himselfe. He was also wrought, (though to his great dishonour) to receiue Nabarzanes that had ioyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons haue beene, and are.

HEre it is said, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazons, came to visite him, and her suite was, (which she easily obtained) That she might accompany him till she were made with childe by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her owne Country.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander; and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may iustly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more iustly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, becaus an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke; and threw it into the riuer of Indus; saying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we beleeue & know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we giue credit vnto writers, making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaues the matter vndetermined. Therefore I will here take leaue to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discouerers touching these warlike Women, becaus not onely Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Iulius Solinus seates them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the Riuer Thermodoon; the other, neere the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath commented vpon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certaine that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neere the Mountaines Hippaci, not farre from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it selfe toward India, Solinus and Pliny tels vs; Where they gouerned a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselues. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Sol. c. 27. & 65.
Lib. 1.
Ptol. lib. 6. Asiæ Tab. 2.
Plin. l. 6. c. 20.

Medis leuibusq́; Sabæis
Imperat hic sexus: Reginarumq́; sub armis,
Barbaria pars magna iacet.

Claud. de cap. Proserpinæ.

Ouer the Medes, and light Sabæans, reignes
This female sexe: and vnder armes of Queen,
Great part of the Barbarian Land remaines.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a riuer falling into the Euxine Sea, neere Heraclium.

Lib. 2.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels vs that the Scythians call Oiorpatas, which is as much, as Viricidas, or Men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, & burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon & Auentinus report, which they performed forty yeares after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it selfe we read of Pentheselea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Æneiad. 1. l. 3.

Am. Marcellinus giues the cause of their inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with diuers Nations, & of their ouerthrow.

L. 22. c. 7.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuen to Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he saith farther, That these women entertaine the Gelæ and Lelages once a yeare, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But

Histor. Ind. part. 1. c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the riuer of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1542. (vpon which riuer, for the diuers turnings, he is said to haue sailed sixe thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Vlrichus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. when he sailed vp the Riuers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherues, inhabiting vnder the Tropick of Capricorne, who gaue his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of siluer, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brests, and liue a-part from men, saue at one time of the yeare, when they feast & accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Portugals know.

I haue produced these authorities in part, to iustifie mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deliuered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the riuer of Papamena (since the Spanish discoueries called Amazons) that these women still liue and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxury: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOw as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperity had so much ouer-wrought his vertue, as he accompted clemency to be but baseneſſe, & the temperance which he had vsed all his life time, but a poore & deiected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King, as the World could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground & adore him; he ware the robes and garments of the Persians, & commanded that his Nobility should doe the like: he entertained in his Court & Camp, the same shameleſſe rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, & imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, & detested maners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he serued (detesting the vices of the inuaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were, could not be but fearful vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyranny he vaunted to haue deliuered so many Nations. Yea, those that were deerest and neerest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauailes, more impouerished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; & that it was hard to iudge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaues. Neither were these opinions so reserued, but that the noise of them came to his eares. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose iudgments he was most iealous; and making it knowne to the Army, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, & that he had compounded a great Army of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselues (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Army seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much vnlike the warfare of the French) hauing commanded euery mans fardels to be brought into the market-place, he, together with his owne, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but haue proued most most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud, than in the kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often obserued) his happy temeritie ouercome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernment ouer the Arrians, was reuolted; whereupon leauing the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebell, hearing of his comming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the aduantage of a strong winde, won the passage ouer an high and vnaccessable Rocke, which was defended against him, with thirteene thousand foot. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoake, forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill warre of France, certaine Caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by an yron chaine, & a waighty stone in the middest, those that defended it, vvere so smothered, as they rendred themselues with their plate, mony, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arriuall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie-people, vvho did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoake, there was not any one that escaped. Sir Iohn Borrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by hauing the grasse fired behinde him; but the smoake being timefully discouered, he recouered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixeteene of his men. I remember these things, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne down the grasse and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, vvithout any other enemy, than a handfull of straw set on fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria; to the East of Bactria, where the chiefe Citie of that Prouince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the reuolt of Satribarzanes, but in the end he receiued the Inhabitants to mercy. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fiue thousand and fiue hundred foot, and neere fiue hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His iourney out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For hauing (as all his Historians tell vs) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaues it at the very entrance, & takes the way of Hyrcania; from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaine Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, hauing (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loued, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard so foule a matter vttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to haue slaine him for security of his owne life. So, constrained by feare, he made shew as if he had bin won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned vp to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Cebalinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Cebalinus (who might with least suspition) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Cebalinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole busines; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealement of the treason, argued his hand to haue bin in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein haue I so offended thee, that thou shouldest thinke Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himselfe, that he liued no longer, than to giue his last groane in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might iustly breede. His answer vvas, That vvhen the practice was reuealed vnto him by Nichomachus, he iudging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might haue better information. This errour of his, (if it were onely an errour) although Aexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and giuen him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he againe swallowed his Princely promise, & made his enemies his Iudges. Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himselfe, that he could neuer find a better occasion to oppresse his priuate enemie, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath giuen a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their priuate hate,
In these faire colours of the publike good,
And to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And arm'd with power and Princes iealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest ranke of treacheries,
That no one action shall seeme innocent:
Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries vnto ends vniust:
And euen the seruice of the State must lade
The needfull'st vndertaking with distrust;
So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie,
Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the king following the aduice of Craterus, had resolued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to binde him, he cryed out vpon the king in these words: O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vrged against him by Alexander himselfe (for the kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title giuen him by Iupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieue for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in dispight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers, Hector and Micanor hauing beene lost in the present Warre. He was so greatly oppresst with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sanke vnder those that led him. In the end, the king asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the king to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might vnderstand him. But hereof the king made his aduantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdained the language of his owne Country, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the kings, Philotus greatly lamented, seeing the king, who had so sharpely inueyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For not his enemies onely were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, hauing discouered the kings disposition and resolution, contending among themselues, which of them should exceede in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which he vsed in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus, desired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to aduenture himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly haue valued the party, and haue incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas said well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to haue heartned Nicomachus, would haue named him, though he had neuer dealt vvith him in any such practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the king, there vvas not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that aduersity being seldome able to beare her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not alwayes deseruing it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoeuer it were, to auoide the extremity of resistlesse and vnnaturall torments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would haue slaine him forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope; and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and bloud, he was forced to deliuer, not what he knew, but whatsoeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Of this kinde of iudiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur: & cum queritur vtrum sit nocens, cruciatur: & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas penas: non quia illud commisisse detegitur, sed quia non commisisse nescitur? what shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilest yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie; not because he is knowne to haue committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it? Aug. de ciuit: Dei. l. 1. 9. c. 6.

It had beene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had beene put to death without torment, the rest would not much haue grieued thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greatest motiue of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum ammiti animo; serius ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiecto homine, in siluestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice; it is vnworthy of so milde a spirit: It is euen a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a sauage Monster. Sen. de clem. l. 1.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, vvhether the confession that Philotas made, vvere to giue end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truely, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now, vvhile the kings hands vvere yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncestes, sonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeares in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there vvere that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselues that they knew no way so direct to winne the kings fauour, as by louing those whom the king fauoured; they vvere dismist. But Parmenio vvas yet liuing; Parmenio, vvho had serued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had depresst Attalus the Kings enemie; that had alwayes, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no lesse prudent in counsell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that he would haue dishonoured his fidelity in his eldest age, hauing now liued threescore and ten yeares) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselues of his affection; it was resolued that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and hauing Cleander and other Murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he Lib. 7. was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domiq; clari viri; Multa sine Rege prosperè, Rex sine illo nihil magnæ rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him did neuer effect any thing worthy of praise.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was deliuered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought vnder his obedience the Araspians or Euergitans; he made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouernour, then he subdued the Arachosians, & left Menon to command ouer them. Here the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelue thousand Macedons & Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length he came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie, which he honoured with his owa name, and peopled it with seuen thousand of his old Macedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre. The Arians, who since he left them were reuolted, he subdued againe by the industry and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolues to finde out the new king Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe ouer the great Riuer of Oxus which diuides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, insomuch as when they came to the Riuer of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadowes. Hee found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forc't to sew together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in sixe daies to passe ouer his Armie, which Bessus might easily haue distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army a far off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slaue had stiled himself a King, he durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therfore those that were neerest vnto him, and whom hee most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moued both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain closed about his necke like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemie.

In the meane while Alexander was arriued at a certaine Town inhabited with Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly (after they had receiued him with great ioy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he receiued Bessus, and hauing rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that deliuered him, he gaue the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Campe, in repelling whom he receiued a shot in the legge, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foote.

Soone after he came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citie of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he receiued the Embassadors of the Scythians (called Auians) vvho offered to serue him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately deliuered into his hands the Traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resoluedly defended against him, all which, after victory, he defaced & rased, killing all therein. At one of these he receiued a blow on the necke, which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recouered Maracanda, against whom he imployed Menedemus with three thousand foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeue Curtius and others) till he came to the Riuer of Tanais, vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria, threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seuenteen daies after the wals built. The building of this Citie is said to haue bin occasion of a war betweene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King persyading himselfe, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well vnderstand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was iudged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit sicknesse for very feare, should neuerthelesse make suit for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but onely the defence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with vvhom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victory described, in pursuit of which the Macedons ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus haue greatly mistaken this Riuer, which they call Tanais. For it was the Riuer of Iaxartes, that runs betweene Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recouery of Samarchand: But Tanais which diuides Asia from Europe, is neere two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desart and vnknowne. So that Alexander had (besides Iaxartes) the great Riuer of Volga and many others to swim ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: vvhich (from the place where he was) he could hardly haue discouered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imployed all the time that he liued in Asia in that trauaile.

Wherefore it is enough to beleeue, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citie, vvhich vvas like to giue some hinderance to their excursions, were driuen away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensiue Armes, easily chased some ten or twelue miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his iournie; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set vp a monument.

Threescore of the Macedons are said to haue bin slaine, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight; which might easily be in passing a great Riuer, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their own successe, that writers haue beene able to deliuer such particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to set downe vvhat vve finde, especially when it serues to giue light to the businesse in hand. The small number vvhich the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number vvhich they slew (a thing not vsed in Curtius, who forbeares nothing that may set out the greatnes of Alexander) & the little bootie that was gotten, doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of a few rouing Tartars (the like being yeerly performed by the Moscouite) without any any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

While Alexander was assuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Iaxartes, he receiued the ill newes that Menedemus was slaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine; to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kils, burns, & lies waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leauing a new Gouernour in that Prouince.

To repaire this losse he receiued a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria, with all which, & the old Armie, he returnes towards the South, and passeth the Riuer of Oxus; on the South-side whereof he built sixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start vp Rebell, called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had sought in vaine to win by faire words, he made choice of three hundred young men, & promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a signe to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place, who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was already mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death, which punishment they well deserued for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue been defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which I will giue you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, ioyning to Garnsey and of that gouernement, was in Queene Maries time surprised by the French, and could neuer haue been recouered againe by strong hand, hauing victell and corne enough vpon the place to feed so many men as will serue to defend it, and being euery way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle, offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkeise, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses. The French receiued them at their landing, and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gaue them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rockes with great difficulty. Some part of the French tooke the Flemish Boat & rowed aboard their Ship, to fetch the commodities promised, & what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they run to the Cliffe and cry to their Company aboord the Flemish to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselues and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions skin, that else would be too short.

§. XIX.

How Alexander slew his owne friends.

After these Sogdian and Scythian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of Lion, and other friuolous matters, and that he committed the Gouernment of Margiana, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he obiected to the King the death of Parmenio, and detested the Oracle of Hammon:

for

for therein he touched him to the quicke, the same being deliuered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserued as much at the Kings hands, as any man liuing had done, and had in particular saued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselues) forgat whom he went about to slay, for the griefe whereof he tare his own face and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Callisthenes, it is thought he would haue slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischiefes are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detexit; obstantem multa conatibus verecundiam removet; ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emersit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit. Drunkennesse both kindles and layes open euery vice; it remooues out of the way that shame which giues impediment vnto badde attempts; where wine gets the maistrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkennesse indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately reuolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-Rebels, disposed of the Prouinces which he past ouer, and went on with his Armie into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Traine. From hence he inuaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, & presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vse any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, hauing so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the meane while he would needs be honoured as a God: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he imployed two pernicious Parasites, Agis and Cleo; whom Callisthenes opposed; For, among many other honest arguments vsed to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdaine the gift of God-head from his vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowsing feast) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they liued, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a part from and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Callisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the king to others, but because he neuer would condescend to betray the king to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the king made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Callisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne asunder vpon the racke: This deed vnworthy of a king, Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen aternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla alterius facies redimet. Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur Callisthenem: Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium: opponitur, Callisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoque tentauit mare classibus, & Imperium ab angulo Thraciæ vsque ad Orientis terminos protulit: dicetur, sed Callisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Darium Regumque exempla transierit, ex his quæ fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam fecisse Callisthenes; This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which no vertue nor felicitie of his to-warre shall euer be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, He slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, He did so, and he slew Callisthenes: when it shall bee said, He slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Callisthenes; when it shall be said, He wanne all vnto warre in the very Ocean, thereon also he aduentured with vnusuall Nauies, and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the vtmost bounds of the Orient; he slew but one man; But he killed Callisthenes. Let him haue out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Callisthenes to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders iourney into India. The battaile betweene him and Porus.

WIth the Armie before remembred, of one hundred & twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselues vnto him, he entertained louingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Childe, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he remoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits & Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to vvhom he made feasts for ten daies together. Now when he had drunke his fill, he vvent on towards Dedala, and from thence to Acadera, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victualls failing, he diuides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cenon, another, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it 3. hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it vvas yeelded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he receiued a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rocke of great strength by himselfe: he wanne also a passage vpon one Eryx, who was slaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arriued at the Riuer of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arriuall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and fiue and fiftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his seruice and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he vvas an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiasares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dis-vnion to make his owne victorie by farre the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourescore talents of siluer coyne; which Alexander not onely refused, but to shew that he was couetous of glory, not of gold, he gaue Omphis a thousand talents of his owne treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abiasares, hauing heard that Alexander had receiued his enemie Omphis into his protection, resolued to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, he thought it an ill match vvhen Alexander, who had alreadie beaten vnder foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus he receiued this manly answer; That he vvould satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he vvas resolued to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to finde Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore & ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely stayed somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The Riuer vvas foure furlongs broad, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there vvas one vvell shadowed vvith vvood, and of good capacitie. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the Riuer with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus; who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troopes and aduanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeues, that Abiasares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had bin come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it.

But

But he findes it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vse: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who so galled those Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gaue vp the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc't to recoile. Porus moues forward with grosse of his Armie, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Eurymatus, he directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried vpon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foote were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long & strong Pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them as being inraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captaines, the victory fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northerne Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countie people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he receiued his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

I Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes: or of those pettie Warres which Alexander made betweene the ourethrow of Porus, and his sailing downe the Riuer of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to beleeue, till our own experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seene betweene London and Staines.

Our great traueller Mandeuile, who died in the yeare 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World, yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to iudge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimius in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, saith Guichardine. Guic. in Dise. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Riuers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlaine, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a shippe of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeare 1609. and some of the company trauelled ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they indeuoured to subiect to them the Oxydracæ, a people inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vnderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainely knowne, that the great kings of the vttermost East, haue had the vse of the Canon many hundreds of yeares since, and euen since their first ciuiltie and greatnesse, which was long before

Alexanders

Alexanders time. But Alexander pierc't not so farre into the East. It sufficed, that having alreadie ouer-wearied his Armie, he discouered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggrameues, who commanded many Nations beyond the Riuer Ganges, was the powerfullest king of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than euer to proceed in this discouery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander ouer those great Desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasiue Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the Riuer of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie tricke, vvherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to be made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armours & Bridles about his Campe, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these he raised vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his iournies end. This was a readie way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing saue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he stroue so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned againe to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to set vp his fleet, where Acesines and Hydaspis incounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those riuers two Cities: the one he called Nicæa, & the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe he receiued a fourth supply of sixe thousand Thracian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fiue and twenty thousand Armours, garnished with siluer and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Riuers he wan many Townes, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, he past downe the Riuer with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arriuall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. He feasted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch, returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poysoned swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward king of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearb which Alexander dreamt he had seene in the mouth of a Serpent,

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden, shuffled one vpon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riuer, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies obserued well the course of the Sea, he past out of the riuers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to informe himselfe, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixt Booke hath written this passage downe the Riuer of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels, in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were vsed therein, and other the maruellous prouisions made.

Neere the out-lets of this riuer, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recouered Gedrosia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

§. XXII.

Of Alexanders riot, Crueltie, and death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, he gaue himselfe wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hatefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Crueltie. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Aspastes one of his Prouinciall Gouernors he commanded to be slaine, so as neither did the excesse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of fiue thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had bin imployed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded, and their offences were so outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not haue commited them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with sixe hundred Souldiers by them imployed, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in especiall fauour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certaine loose fellowes to witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which he was condemned to die; but he assisted the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Coperat (saith Curtius) esse praceps ad repraesentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head-longly to shed blood and to beleeue false reports. It is true, that he tooke a way to make all men weary of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all aduentures that can be made against it.

Arrianus hath a farre different description of Cyrus Tombe.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when he had liued threescore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, or sought to preuent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he maried Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger sister to his beloued Ephestion, and fourescore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were sixe thousand guests inuited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thousand young souldiers, out of his conquered Prouinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, hauing lauishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fiue thousand Talents, and sixe thousand hired Souldiers; but he was rejected in Greece, and there slaine. Alexander greatly reioyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet he sent commandement, that they should againe receiue their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselues (except the Athenians) though they resolued, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marueilous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolued to send into Macedan all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the trauell of War, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He vsed many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempeſt of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they haue tumbled a while, ſo are the vnconſiderate multitude eaſily conducted when their firſt paſſions are euaporate. With ſuch as were licenced to depart, he ſent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantſhip of Macedon, Theſſaly, and Thrace, vvhich Antipater had held from his firſt departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his abſence, diſcharged the truſt committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and ſent him ſo many ſtrong ſupplies into Aſia from time to time. Certainely if Alexander had not taken counſell of his cups, he would haue caſt ſome better colour on this alteration, and giuen Antipater a ſtronger reaſon for his remoouе, than to haue imployed him in the conduction of a new ſupply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater ſaw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings diſpoſition to ſend him after Parmenio, and the reſt. With this Antipater, the King, notwithſtanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though iealous, doe not ſtand in doubt of euery man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kinde of kingly courage, compounded of hardineſſe and vnderſtanding, which is many times ſo fearefull vnto them, as they take leaue both of Law and Religion, to free themſelues thereof.

After he had ſent for Antipater, he made a iourney into Media to ſettle things there; where Epheſtion, whom he fauoured moſt of all men, dies. The King according to the greatneſſe of his loue, laments his loſſe, hangs his Phyſician, and beſtowes vpon his Monument twelue thouſand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but ſent; and not to excuſe himſelfe, but to free himſelfe. For if we beleeue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-ſay) Antipater by his ſonnes, Caſſander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poyſon; Theſſalus (vvho vvas of the conſpiracie) hauing inuited him to a drinking feaſt of purpoſe. For after he had taken a carouſe in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke ſtronger than Hercules himſelfe, he quited the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World haue ſeldome found good, by making their Miniſters ouer-great, and thereby ſuſpicious to themſelues. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perſwaded, that Kings ought to purchaſe it from their Vaſſalls, will neuer pleaſe himſelfe vvith the price giuen. The onely reſtoratiue, indeed, that ſtrengthens it, is the goodneſſe and vertue of the Prince, and his liberality makes it more diligent; ſo as proportion and diſtance be obſerued. It may be that Antipater hauing commanded two or three kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Caſar did, after he had ſo long a time gouerned the Gaules, where he vtterly forgat the art of obedience. A moſt cruell and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared ſome ill meaſure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calliſthenes, hauing bin ſo lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the king had reſolued to haue giuen him ſome other great gouernment in Aſia: The old Souldiers thence returned, hauing perchance deſired to be gouerned by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders perſon and qualities.

HOwſoeuer it vvere, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excuſed, no more than his vanitie to be eſteemed the ſonne of Iupiter, with his exceſſiue delight in drinke and drunkenneſſe, which others make the cauſe of his feuer and death. In that he lamented his want of enterpriſing, and grieued to conſider what he ſhould doe when he had conquered the World, Auguſtus Ceſar found iuſt cauſe to deride him, as if the well-gouerning of ſo many Nations and kingdomes, as he had already conquered, could not haue offered him matter more than aboundant, to buſie his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his firſt booke of the Aduancement of Learning, hath prooued it ſufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praiſe, becauſe it exceeded proportion. It is ſaid, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his ſeruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modeſty refuſe it, as diſproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to giue: of which Seneca;

For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition ta-
10 ken by it selfe, not much to be admired. For I am resolued that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himselfe. Surely such venturous natures were to be commended 30 when they should be found that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeues, Ruffians, and 40 desperate Daggers. For certainely it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are imployed for the seruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

CHAP. III.

The reigne of Aridæus.

The first question about succession to Alexander.

Hib. death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian 40 [illegible] In such case, as was that monstrous Giant Poly-[illegible] having but his onely eye. For, that which is reported in fa-[illegible] bles of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedoni[illegible] though in some sort vnprofitable, but for want of good guidance [illegible] and vnderstanding, to imploy to themselues. The causes whereof [illegible] were, partly the vncertainty of [illegible] Title of succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the ambi-[illegible] tious humor of Alexanders Nobility, who thinking none worthy to be his Heire, did re[illegible] fuse that right in any, hoping euery one to his owne fortune: but especi-
[illegible] ally the ambition of his followers, who all hauing learned of their Master to suffer no [illegible] equall, from a high vnto spirits reaching vpon their owne worth, which the re[illegible] gard of their blood failed to second, either out of their loue, or because [illegible] they were all strangers. Philip the Father of Alexander, hauing
[illegible] by his Ambassadors, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not resigning it vnto [illegible] the hands of his daughter Eurydice, when he grew to mans estate, but [illegible] hauing vpon his owne marriage with Daughters of Aegeadæ, by which bond, [illegible] and the hope of some progeny, he assured [illegible]

against Alexander in the beginning of his reigne. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to haue beene acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they liued, vnlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbad the reigne of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserning to be laid in ballance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander hauing taken many wiues, had issue by none of the principall of them: for Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian had borne vnto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with childe. But the baseneſse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) haue wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, & Aridæus his bastard brother (son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may giue suspition, that either Law or Custome had made that sexe vncapable of the Soueraignty: Aridæus (besides his bastardy) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lacke of a better: when the Counsailors hauing ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deuising what was best, were content for very wearinesse to take what came next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who reiected all mention of the halfe-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be giuen to the Captaines; that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Ptolomy was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who hauing vsed the company of Arsinoë Ptolomie's mother, deliuered her in marriage to Lagus being great with childe. Therefore, vvhether it were so, that he hoped well to worke his own fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with subiection to one, deseruing regard by his bloud, and trust for his euen carriage; or whether he desired onely to get a share to himselfe, which could not haue come to passe, had all been giuen to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himselfe; and therefore gaue such counsaile as fitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deuice of his tooke place indeed, though not in forme as he had propounded it: For, it vvas in effect all one, to haue assembled at Alexanders empty chaire, as Ptolomy had conceiued the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridæus, no wiser than the chaire it selfe. Also the controuersies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers, doe often take checke by the plain dealing of them, who dare to go more directly to worke: so was it like to haue fared with Ptolomy & the rest, when Aristonus, another of the Captaines, interpreted the words of Alexander; saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as deeming Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) he deliuered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his owne purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose another construction: euery one being vncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not be of the last, vrged Perdiccas to take vpon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gaue him not such reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephestion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might well be commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had giuen much proofe of his prowesse & valour. But very surly he was: which quality (ioyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Maiesty:

Maiesty: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish ouer-weaning did him as great harme, as it had been great happinesse to haue succeeded Alexander. For not content to haue the acclamation of the Souldiers, approuing the sentence of Aristonus, he would needs counterfeit modesty, thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waighty burden of an Empire, which would be the less enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truely said, He that faineth himselfe a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolfe. Meleager, a man by nature enuious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas, tooke aduantage of his irresolute behauiour, and very bitterly enueighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoeuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to haue brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoile thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles there about arising; the first diuision of the Empire.

DVring this vp-roare, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Army. Meleager hauing withdrawne himselfe tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the couenant which Perdiccas at first had giuen, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this childe was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with sixe hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, and inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soueraigne Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion, that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiccas rebuked with such grauity, that they departed honester than they came; being sorry for their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the Campe was in an vp-roare, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as hauing newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe afforded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager, abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renued out of their pitty that fauourable affection, which had moued them to set him vp at the first.

Perdiccas hauing now ioyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victuals from the City. But after sundry Embassies passing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they) requiring to haue the Authors of sedition giuen vp into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be ioyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in gouernment of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should haue done well to consider; That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to giue him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked vnder their great facility. Generall peace was renewed, and much loue protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart giue it life, and windy spirits they were which moued in the arteries. False reports were giuen out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his owne disgrace, but in such termes as might seeme to haue proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an iniury done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receiue their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischieuously laied. Had Meleager giuen way to seditious rumours, he must needs haue incurred the generall hatred of all, as a sower of dissension, & thereby with a publike approbation might haue bin cut off, as hauing often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weake a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedy way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their quality set in aray, apart from others; as if they had beene of sundry sorts, met at aduenture: which done, the maner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their seuerall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disaduantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discouered no iesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custome Perdiccas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Aridæus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before, he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now hee rides with Perdiccas vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them slaine, in the presence of the King, who should haue defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Hauing therfore kept himself quiet a while, as vnwilling to giue offence to them which had the aduantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what maner of man their King was, diuided all the Prouinces of the Empire among themselues; leauing to Aridæus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon, whose body hauing bin seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no signe of poison appearing, how great soeuer the suspition might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captains, who was two yeares preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friends being layed in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his owne building, in Egypt.

§. III.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, or preſently after, Antipater & Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferior to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the reſt, were buſied in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more bravely than wiſely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did proſecute more boldly than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the baniſhed Greekes (few excepted) ſhould be reſtored vnto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Eſtates, & therfore thought ſo to prouide, that in euery City he would haue a ſure party. But it fell out otherwiſe: For he loſt the hearts of many more than he wan by this proud iniunction. His pleaſure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being againſt all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in eſtate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient ſpirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; ſo did alſo the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but ſeemed to beate themſelues, as men that had done no more than they might well iuſtifie by reaſon: neuertheleſſe to preuent the worſt, the Athenians gaue ſecret inſtructions to Leoſthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leuie an Army, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readineſſe for their vſe. This was no hard thing for Leoſthenes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Aſian Warre in poore eſtate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of theſe he had gathered vp eight thouſand, when the certain newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it ſelfe, and more honourably than wiſely, proclaimed open War againſt the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leoſthenes drew in the Ætolians, and ſome other Eſtates, gaue battaile to the Bœotians, who ſided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing ſo faſt in reputation, and ſo ſtrong in Adherents, That Antipater (arming in all haſte, yet ſuſpecting his owne ſtrength) was faine to ſend into Aſia to Craterus for ſuccour.

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, ſhunning or purſuing their deſtinies afarre off, which deceiue all mortall wiſedome, euen when they ſeem neere at hand. One month was ſcarcely paſt, ſince nothing ſo heauily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now deſired as the moſt likely aſſurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the moſt aſſured vnto him, was ſent into Macedon to conueigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence,) & to ſucceed Antipater in the gouernment of Macedon and Greece. The ſuſpitions were ſtrong that he had a priuy charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly publiſhed ſound much better; which was, That Antipater ſhould be ſent vnto the King, as Captaine of the young Souldiers, newly to be leuied in Europe. For Alexander was much incenſed againſt him by his Mother Olympias: and would ſometimes giue out ſpeeches, teſtifying his owne iealouſie and hatred of him; but yet he ſtroue to ſmother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had eſcaped with life: moſt of them indeed were meane perſons in regard of thoſe who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) remoued to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was ſuch, as could finde rebellious purpoſes (for ſo he interpreted euen lewd gouernment) in baſe perſons; little might Antipater hope for, who hauing ſitten Vice-roy ten yeares in the ſtrongeſt part of the Empire, was called away to the preſence of ſo fell a Maſter, and the enuy of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiours, which would now repine to ſee him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working firſt the Kings death by poyſon, giuen by his ſonne Iolaus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not foorth vntill opportunity had changed it into the paſſion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his ſon Caſſander: great cauſe of much feare he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the preſent Craterus was ſent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neere, ſollicited ſolicited to make haſte. Not without cauſe: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raiſed more than thirteene thouſand foot, and ſixe hundred horſe; which Muſter was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptied into Aſia. The Theſſalians indeed who had long ſtood firme for Philip & Alexander, who alſo were the beſt horſemen of Greece, furniſhed him with very braue troups, that might haue done great ſeruice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With theſe forces did Antipater in Theſſaly trie the fortune of a battaile with Leoſthenes, rather (as may ſeem) fearing the increaſe of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the firſt) than preſuming on his ſtrength. For Leoſthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thouſand foot, beſides the aſſiſtance of many petty Signories, and of ſome Illyrians, and Thracians: of horſe he brought into the field about two thouſand and fiue hundred, but ouer-ſtrong he was that way alſo, when once the Theſſalians had reuolted vnto him. So Antipater loſt the day: and his loſſe was ſuch, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a ſafe retrait into his owne Country: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all things neceſſary to beare out a ſiege. Thither did Leoſthenes follow him, preſent him battaile againe, and vpon refuſall cloſe vp the Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will we leaue him for a while, trauailing in the laſt honourable enterpriſe that euer was vndertaken by the great City of Athens.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas emploied his Army.

KIng Aridæus liuing vnder the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatneſſe conſiſting in a bare title, ſupported by the ſtrength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwiſe than to make vſe of him. Perdiccas had no Prouince of his owne peculiar, neither vvas he like to be vvelcome to any whom he ſhould viſit in his gouernment. A ſtronger Army than any of the reſt he had, which he might eaſily hope in that vnſettled condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Prouinces could haue bin. The better to accompliſh his deſires, he cloſely ſought the marriage of Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander; yet about the ſame time he either married Nicæa the Daughter of Antipater, or made ſuch loue to her as blinded their eyes, who did not ſomewhat narrowly ſearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the ſecond of that name, & tenth King of that Country, had continued faithful to the Perſian Empire as long as it ſtood: following the example of his forefathers, euen from Pharnaces the firſt that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoſſa ſiſter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Anceſtors had (indeed) beene oppreſſed by the Perſians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertue reſtored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much increaſed all. But now in the fatall Period of ſo great an Empire, with much wiſdome, and (Darius being ſlain) with ſufficient honour, he might haue acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perſians roome. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater buſineſſe wherin to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, ſurrounded with Prouinces of the Macedonian conqueſt, & for his owne particular to haue one opportune place of ſure retrait, vnder the gouernment of a ſtedfaſt friend. Therfore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thouſand foot, and fifteene thouſand horſe (a ſtrong Army, had it not encountred a ſtronger, and better trained) wan the victory, and therby the whole kingdome. But with much cruelty did he vſe the victory: for hauing taken Ariarathes priſoner with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon; and ſo deliuered that Prouince to Eumenes, whom of all men liuing he truſted moſt.

Another part of his forces he had comitted to Python, rather as to the moſt honourable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſubdue the Greeks, rebelling in the high Countries of Aſia. About twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were ſoon weary of their vnpleaſant habitations, & the rude people, among whom they liued: and therefore tooke aduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselues a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to destroy them: which intent of his, Perdiccas discouering, did both giue him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enioyned it vnto Pythons Captaines (his owne creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for vse of the victory might haue proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victory it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heate of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire vvithout necessity to a hill not farre off. This dismaied the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their liues and liberty, vnder condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse feare without great losse had caused to leaue the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse wherof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leuied; the Rulers of the Prouinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enioyned to giue assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leauing Python as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his great Master.

Now vvas Perdiccas mighty aboue the mighty, and had faire leasure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded, will appeare when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

§. V.

The processe of the Lamian warre.

VVE left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himselfe without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leosthenes, and would haue yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring warre, the Æolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or hauing businesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leaue, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to sally out vpon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued; their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in comming. Lysimachus, who was neerest at hand in Thrace, had worke too much of his owne, leading no more than foure thousand foote, and two thousand horse, against Seuthes the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly sollicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the gouernment of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand fiue hundred horse, whether leuied out of his Prouince, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Army, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the iourny into Greece, than Antipater was to haue him come. For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe City of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therfore brought himselfe into great suspition, that soon ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach forsooke the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerers of Asia, with purpose to giue them an euill welcome home, before Antipater and they should ioyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the aduantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued so: for he wan a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly was driuen into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his natiuity. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battell, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing sutable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betooke themselues to high grounds, vnfit for seruice on horse backe, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Campe, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiuing their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of aduantage; which gaue more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the Enemy to be vanquished. This wretchlesnes (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to haue made themselues once againe Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captiuity of Greece came on, of which she neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Army hauing made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessaly, ioyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being ioyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiue thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and fiue hundred in horse, in foote eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to auoid the necessity of a battaile, vntill such time as the Towns confederate, should returne vnto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazzard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thessalians had the vpper hand, and held it, vntill such time as they perceiued their battailes (ouer-laid with multitude) retire vnto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, hauing little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some fiue hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great vse made: For the Greeks, as not subiect vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euery one desirous to preserue his owne estate, and City; concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile Artificer, and well vnderstanding their aptnesse to diuision, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed euery City to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuice was so apparant, that it was reiected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the comming of their Assistants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Townes in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne assured and present calamity.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. Of Demosthenes his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed seuerely, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions giuen to the most forward, inuiting such as were slacke. Onely the Athenians and Ætolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, hauing beene Authors of this tumult: and their feare was not great, the seat of the warre being farre from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, deuising vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their doors, before their consultation could finde issue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadours, desiring peace vpon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to haue accepted euen the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, grauity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselues to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the gouernment of the City to those of most wealth, depriuing of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a conuenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was giuen; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to get their liuings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giuing their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie, the violent vsurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had beene wont to say, That warre to them was peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leauing as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well haue passed for very milde: whereas now all such, as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or haue fur-rendred their iudgements to Authors iustly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all ciuill Nations, that the euill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soeuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswaded him to leaue the place; but not so preuailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite as it had beene to write somewhat, secretly tooke poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to do the last execution vpon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battaile, howsoeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loued money well; and had great summes giuen him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Country, great reward, for speaking such things as tended to his Countries good; which he did not ceaſe to procure, when the Perſians were no longer able to giue him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpoſe to haue done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a ſtedfaſt enemy to the Macedonians; therefore diſcretion required that he ſhould be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Country, yet applying himſelfe to the neceſſity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the City much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grieuous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquiſhed) he endeuoured carefully to preſerue.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawne from their Ætolian Warres into Aſia. The grounds of the firſt Ciuill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they ſtrengthned their friendſhip with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went againſt the Ætolians, whoſe pouerty was not ſo eaſily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Country was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great faſtneſſe, into which they conueied ſuch of their goods as they moſt eſteemed, and of their people, as were leaſt fit for warre: with the reſt they fortified the ſtrongeſt of their Cities, and ſo abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully reſiſted. With great obſtinacy did the Macedonians contend againſt the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had ſhut vp all paſſages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe, then were they put to a miſerable choice; either to deſcend from their ſtrong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall number, or to endure the miſeries of hunger & cold, againſt which they could make no long reſiſtance; or to yeeld themſelues to the Macedonians: who incenſed by the loſſe of many good Souldiers, were not like to leaue ſo ſtubborne enemies in places, which might giue confidence to rebellion. In caſes of extremity, much fineneſſe of wit apprehending all circumſtances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt conſideration of that only, which at the preſent is in hand. Theſe Ætolians did not as yet want meat: but their enemies daily moleſted them: wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For ſuch newes came out of Aſia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater & Craterus thinke euery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of theſe Ætolians, giuing them whatſoeuer conditions they would aske: yet with purpoſe to call them to ſeuere account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuity, when once they ſhould haue ſetled the affaires of Aſia; as they hoped and deſired. But of mens purpoſes God is diſpoſer: in whoſe high counſell it was ordained, that this poore Nation ſhould continue a troubleſome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into thoſe and other Prouinces. Likewiſe concerning the matters of Aſia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was ſo far from taking effect, that it ſerued meerly as an introduction to all the ciuill wars enſuing.

The grounds of the Aſiatique expedition, which did ſet the world in an vp-roare, were theſe. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightieſt in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedency, and the preſent rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the beſt beloued, and moſt reſpected both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next vnto theſe had Perdiccas been; whom the aduantage of his preſence at the Kings death did make equall, or ſuperiour, to either of theſe, if not to both together. The firſt intents of Perdiccas were, to haue conſorted with theſe two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernment of all; to which purpoſe he entertained the diſcourſe of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in ſhort ſpace the ſtrength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and ſoare quite another way. Aridæus was a very ſimple man, yet ſerued well enough to weare the title of that Maieſty, whereof Perdiccas being Adminiſtrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more ſeuere than had beene in the dayes of Alexander: the deſire to ſeeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preſeruing themſelues from contempt, and of giuing ſuch a fiery luſtre to their actions, as may daſel the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Aſia were all put to the ſword; and how tyrannouſly the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified, hath already been ſhewed. The Piſidians were the next who felt the wrath of theſe counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was vtterly razed; the children ſold for ſlaues, and all the reſt maſſacred. The Iſaurians by this example growne deſperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themſelues vnable to continue the defence, lockt themſelues into their houſes, & ſet the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themſelues, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other worke than to ſift the aſhes of the burnt City for gold and ſiluer; but Perdiccas had buſineſſe of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to ſit ſtill without imploiment: letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileſt others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their ſeuerall Prouinces. He purpoſed therefore to tranſport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the ſeat of his Anceſtors, and head of the Empire. The Kings preſence would make the Offices of his Vice-royes (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in caſe of priuate men, and onely Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might eaſily be made. So ſhould greatneſſe meet with a good title, and what more could be wiſhed? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might giue, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the buſineſſe proſpered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himſelfe, or be driuen to come to reaſon. Antigonus likewiſe then gouerning in Phrygia, a buſie-headed man, and ill affected to the ſide, was to be looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceiued in ſo thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a iudgement, as high a ſpirit, and as great vndertaking, many of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene leſſe than ſome of them, which made him alſo the leſs reſpected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for, he rated himſelfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had he watched Perdiccas, and ſounded the depth of his purpoſes, which it was now high time to diſcouer. For Perdiccas hauing with a iealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turne, cauſed him to bee charged with ſuch accuſations, as might ſuffice to take away his life, eſpecially by a Iudge that ſought his death. This deuice Antigonus would not ſeeme to perceiue, but prepared himſelfe in ſhew to make anſwer, indeede, to make eſcape, which eaſily he did, putting himſelfe and his ſonne Demetrius aboord of ſome Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with ſuch tidings, as finiſhed the Ætolian warre before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifeſtly perceiue their owne danger: ſo his flight gaue Perdiccas to vnderſtand that his intentions were laied open, and muſt now be iuſtified by the ſword. Therefore he prepared as faſt as he could, not onely for defence, but (as hauing on his ſide the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing ſlacke in prouiding to encounter him. Ptolomy being aduertiſed of theſe proceedings, and conſidering how neerely they concerned him, ſided with Antipater. To his gouernment of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without conſent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middeſt of theſe garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great ſolemnity, purchaſing thereby to himſelfe much good will and many partakers, notwithſtanding the terrible report of the Kings Army comming againſt him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas, vnder-taker of which way to bend his mighty power, and length resolued to fall vpon Ptolomy, (deeming Eumenes to keepe all his vse, against Craterus and the parts of Asia bordering vpon Europe.
It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more reliable men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quicke end with Ptolomy, or he feared that Craterus would not be ready for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling. Ptolomy by his sweet behauiour allured many to his party, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolency, which neuer failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined, An affection founded vpon opinion of an vniust contempt. The whole story of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard vnprofitable attempts without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Town, called the Camels wall: thither he marched by night, with more hast than good speed:
for Ptolomy preuenting him, did put himselfe into the place, where behauing himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gaue the foile to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse, after a vehement, but vaine assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another iourny, (which was his last) and came to the diuisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to passe ouer his Army into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horsemen beneath it, to take vp such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Army being arriued on the further banke, the channell began to waxe deepe; so that where the foremost companies had waded vp to the chin, they who should haue followed, could finde no footing. Whether this came by rising of the water, or sinking away of the ground, the matter being broken with the feete of so many Men, Horse, and Elephants, no certainty there was, but such as had passed must repasse again, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemy, and could not be relieued by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselues to the River, wherein about two thousand of them perished; a thousand were deuoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger, such as were strong, & could swim, recouered the Campe; many were carried downe the streame, and drinking of the contrary banke, where they fell into the hands of their enemies. This disaster exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giuing liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed their euill thoughts of their Generall. While they were vttering murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an vproare.
Ptolomy had not onely shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carkasses, which the River had cast vpon his shore, and caused them to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely reconcile him to the Souldiers, but made the Captaines sit to mutiny, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honorable a person, only to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, whose vices they did abhorre. They being strongly assisted by the Horse, which (as I said) Eumenes had chiefly in charge, did set vpon Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his pretended authority vpon them. Of all the Greeke Captaines that had liued in honour and splen-dour about Alexander, onely Eumenes remained in the diuision of the Prouinces made at Babylon:
he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (that Prote could see) deere vnto him, had neuertheless beene scornfully vsed by him, whereupon he grew ing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentry, (the footmen hauing declared themselues before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him.
Such end had the proud mis-gouerning authority of Perdiccas. He might haue liued Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before we proceede in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meete that we speake of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whileſt Perdiccas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had receiued command from Perdiccas to bee assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions, but Alcetas made flat answer that he would not, alleaging the backwardnesse of his men to beare Armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly hee repined at the preferencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discouering through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that he might stand vpon his owne strength, hee raised out of the Countries vnder his iurisdiction, about six thousand horse, giuing many priuiledges to such as were seruiceable, and training them well vp. Not without great need. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus & Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the inuasion of his Prouinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) aduance, but in hostile maner, though vnprouoked, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his footmen, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and preuailed far vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driuen out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leauing naked the backes of his Macedonian foot-men, to be charged by Eumenes who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes, they cried for mercy, and gladly took their oath to doe him faithfull seruice. Antipater and Craterus endeauoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himself, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loued; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had vndertaken to maintaine.

Whileſt these negotiations were on foote, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, & calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught,) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the victory was wonne; for they would all forth with rebell vnto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to ioyne him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Army to be sent. Their owne affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might preuaile as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the middest of Alexanders vanities, when others (vniuersally their King) betooke themselues to the Persian fashion of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparell; whereby he became very gratious with the common Souldiers, who beheld their new tasides of Asia, with discontented eies, as reproachfull and derogatory to the manners of their native Country. Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold resistance at bay, and to ioyne with Ptolemy. Craterus vsed great celerity, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines, after a great victory. But he had a wary and well aduised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisedome fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own in footmen, but was inferior in horse-men) & thought it more vneasie to keep the Macedonians from reuolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange peece of work, which desperation of all courses else taught him, & wise managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to ioyn with him. Hauing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among them (as hauing bin vanquished by some of them, & forsaken others in plain field, while they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other than much would haue regarded him had he bin known: but Thracians, Cappadocians, & Persians, vnder the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas & himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run vpon the enemy, & giue him no leisure to say or do any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his own person: but placing himself in the right wing of his battell, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he vnderstood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, & ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would giue leaue. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which hauing ascended, the Armies discouered each other: but that of Eumenes euery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long iournies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in surprising them as enemies) to discouer himselfe to his old friends & fellow-souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phœnix a Tenidian, & Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindefull of their instructions, began to giue vpon him, with such countenance as told him his error; which to redeem, he bad his men fight & redeem the day, & take the spoyl to themselues. But the Bear whose skin he sels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battel was fought, gaue most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus; who as soon as they had discouered one another, could not containe themselues, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from vnder them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first vp, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherwith he houghed the other, causing him to fal down & fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they receiued many wounds, but Neoptolemus giuing slight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which he died in the place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) stripped by his mortall enemie, whose reuilings hee requited, lying euen at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spurre, and seeke shelter behinde the battailes of their foote. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie succour succour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had assisted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himself a while, and sustained the impression of Neoptolemus and Eumenes, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little estimation or note. Otherwise it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preserued himself to a better aduenture by giuing ground, as the rest (when hee and Neoptolemus were slaine) did. But whilest he sought to preserue his reputation, hee lost his life by the fall of his horse: or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound receiued; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foote by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknown, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as hauing alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingnesse to become his followers; but their intent was only to refresh themselues, which (by his permission) hauing done, they stole away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incensed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Armie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended by giuing to them the spoyle of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the loue of his own men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had been Traitors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their falshood; neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late reuolt, than by accusing & condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherfore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Iarres betweene Eurydice the Queene, and Python the Protector. Python resignes his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Aridæus being chosen Protectors of King Aridæus and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to sustain so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridæus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well vnderstanding what she was or should be, and thinking her self able to support the weight which Fortune layed vpon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, beeing the onely sonne of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; she had led Armies, and (as a true sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Cleia Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to aduance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had sought to do) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie hauing shaken off such a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward bee reined with a twined thred. Python bearing himself vpon his office, tooke vpon him to giue directions in the Kings name, which the Queen did oftentimes controll, vsing the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python, seeing this, would needes resigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps hee thought, that now being the far worthiest man in the Campe, hee should be intreated to retaine the place, and haue his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this course, for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrary expectations; choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then liuing, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, & began to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue only the King their Spueraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things; the apparant weaknesse of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie neere at hand, arriued in few daies at the Campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to worke by any close deuices, as Perdiccas had done; he had no concurrents, all the Gouernours of Prouinces that remained aliue, acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good seruices done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gaue the rule of Susiana, besides his former Prouinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Asia during that warre.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, winnes a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeares ouer-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it selfe ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keep his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might finde occasion to make vse of it in his own businesse. The first of these which hee vndertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to ioyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull prouisions, but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters, to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as he thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelessly to himselfe, that hee and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to bee in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reseruing it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had vndertaken, Antigonus presented battel to Eumenes; in the heat whereof Apollonides, Generall of the Horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable mischiefe which this traiterous practice had brought vpon him, pursued the villain, & cut him off before he could thrust himselfe into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him vtterly to keepe the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had beene fought; there he burned (according to the manner of the time) the bodies of his owne men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising vp heapes of earth as mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes wch Menander (who was set to look vnto their carriags) brought and published among them, enticed them to loue him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plaine, careless, as after an assured victory, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long seruice; all which he might haue taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should proue a heauie burden to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountains, whilest he detained his men (whom authority could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaues, and to rauish their wiues: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to doe this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtiltie had auoyded those precious fetters, which would haue hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only thinke all cariages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than auaileable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselues; and retaining only fiue hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When hee had wearied Antigonus a while in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more about him, than necessity required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, & so wel victualed and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpose hee entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his loue; Eumenes required restitution of his Prouinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigonus leauing sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iournie into Pisidia against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short worke. He came vpon them vnexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captaine as Eumenes, to haue defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his comming, so were they too aduenturous, in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disaduantages: and their folly was attended with suitable euent. Attalus with many principall Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termesus, where the loue of the yonger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their eares against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazzard their liues and their Countrey in his defence. Yet this auailed him nothing: For the Gouernors of the Town hauing secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to sally out; and vsing the time of aduantage, they with their seruants did set vpon Alcetus, who vnable to resist slew himselfe. His dead body was conueyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the yong men interred the carcasse with solemne funerals, hauing once been minded to set on fire their owne town in reuenge of his death. Such fauour had he purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soeuer, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie winnes Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enioy their Gouernments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Only Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying vpon the authoritie which had giuen him that Prouince, & was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrel of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon, Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Sonne Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) he bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being foure-score yeeres old, hauing alwaies trauelled in the great affaires of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was iealous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly giue place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. In his priuate qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behauiour, not vnlearned, as hauing been Scholler to Aristotle, and written some Historie. Hee had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gaue especiall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approued to haue been sound and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon, who succeeded vnto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, hauing long time beene Apprentise in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee vnder-went, either Nature had not giuen to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage, he called to counsaile all his friends, wherein, for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Maiestie, that might giue authority to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awful regard containe within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force haue beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discerne such oddes in the quality of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. He was left Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to imply. Hee should thereby haue beene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore he began to examine his own power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his father, were his owne assured, especially such as comanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw-in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captaines, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Eurydice, Eurydice, who had in priuate tendred him such curtesie, as was due only to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, & strong enough to suppresse him, before he could haue made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, vnder pretence of hunting, aduised with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse was set on foote; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernment of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discouered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asia. These two therfore stood in need of a ciuill Warre; which Cassander well noted, and presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his father and them, would auaile him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both; & within a little while conueyed himselfe on a sudden ouer the Hellespont, that he might in person aduance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what hee desireth. Antigonus coueteth nothing more, than to find Polysperchon work, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaied him with the same coine; saying, That for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, he would not faile to giue him all manner of succour. Hauing thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common meanes, leading to their seuerall ends.

§. XIIII.

The vnworthy courses held by Polysperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

GReat necessity there was of timely prouision. For, Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. Hee was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Græcian Estate. Therefore (louing to worke circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of Gouernment should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates & principal Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith be either slaine or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an vnthankefull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreame ingratitude, that for hatred of the son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bountie had inabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthy men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians: and in opposition to their priuate Enemie, gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinewes newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflamation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdiuided in faction, are more inraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neerest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such as are diuided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn-in, to the part in ciuill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against iniurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; she hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraued affections, affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ran vnder the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discerne, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchon gaue, and treate with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subiection, might well appeare to haue some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it selfe too base and vnfit for a King to vse coward his conquered Subiects, and ofte-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEuertheleſſe the Athenians with immoderate ioy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, & sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens; who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out vpon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by aduertising them in due time, haue put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grieuously would they haue beene offended, had they known the instructions which Cassander had giuen to Nicanor, & his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retaine Munychia, any iniunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall hauen, against the high-town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good ability. But the Athenians were not long in giuing him sufficient cause to do that, which he would haue done without any cause giuen. They desired him to come vnto their councell, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the war which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to vse, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies measure iustice by profit, yet seldome thriued by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying neere at hand, that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then gouerned in Athens, a man very vnlikely to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a tricke of politique dishonesty, did quietly suffer him to depart and saue himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon began to deuise vpon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own iust reuenge. He leuied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himselfe threin, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Army. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addressed themselues vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceiued not, being blinded with the vaine Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before she durst well aduenture to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and and meaning. He was (indeed) so farre from purposing to let them haue Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them haue themselues. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne hands than leaue in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians and spent much labour in comuning with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for when he seemed to labour to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew iealous, and the displeasure they conceiued against him, they powred out vpon Phocion, depriuing him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselues into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought euery one that best could inueigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander deuising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, & held much priuie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discouered, whereby the vp-roare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driuen to seek safeguard of their liues by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Country of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts, (hauing alwaies been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchon's familiar friend, went along with them (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon, was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet either for want of iudgement in following them, or of honesty in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good successe. For feare of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians, this had caused them to loue him: out of their loue he gathered hope of deceiuing them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast locked vp: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, hee stood wauering betweene the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his deuotion, would indeed haue done well: but the effecting of this began to grow desperate, and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes vpon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giuing all contentment vnto the popular faction, which was then growne to bee Master of that City. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadours come, treading (as one may say) vpon Phocions heeles, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemne audience giuen to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified vvith all exteriour shewes of Maiestie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander; for hee did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should bee tortured and slaine. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that hee spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; vvhose Embassadours hee then had to speake. When their errand vvas done, and answer to it made by the accused, vvho had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest vvere pronounced guiltie of treason; but to giue sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours sake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they vvere Burgesses. Then vvere they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselues, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to bee of the lesse regard. Fiue and fortie times had hee beene chosen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when hee was absent; so well was his integritie knowne, and so highly valued, euen of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Cause repent of hauing followed his counsels, nor any priuate man of hauing trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly cherished him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) sent him two hundred talents of siluer, & offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which he would choose. But Phocion refused these & other gifts, how loeuer importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouerty: wherein he liued about fourescore yeares, and then was compelled by the vniust iudgement of wicked men to drink that poyson, which by iust iudgement of the righteous God, so infected the City of Athens, as from that day forward it neuer brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

Cap. XVI.

Of Polysperchon his vaine expedition against Gassander.

NOt long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piræus; which newes drew Polysperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only he had giuen some impediment to the enemie; who, not contented with defending what hee held, began to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to driue Cassander out of Athens, hee left his Sonne Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie hee carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrey sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratic, or Popular forme of gouernment. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driuen into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedome and authority, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he tearmed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessaries, & resolued to endure the worst. And needs there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came vp to the breach, and at the same time with great labour they raised vp an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants hauing failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much paine to cleare the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driuen through with long nails, which they vsed as gal-throps, bestowing them sleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beate vpon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these prouisions they made happy vse in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherin the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driuen back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled vnder feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leauing some part of his Armie to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to ioyne with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet vnder Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouer-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and incouraging them very well, ſent out Nicanor againe, aſſuring him of the victory, as well he might. For he ſent out ſufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he cauſed to be tranſported ouer the ſtreights in ſmall Veſſels by night; theſe before day-light ſetting vpon the Rhodians, drawe his men, that lay ſecurely on the land, head-long into their ſhips; in which tumult Nicanor arriuing did aſſaile them ſo luſtily, that few or none eſcaped him.

This loſſe at Sea, together with his bad ſucceſſe by Land, brought Polyſperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudy decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own ſword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiuing that he had left them to ſhift for themſelues, and was not able to giue them protection againſt the enemy which lay in their boſomes, came to a-greement with Caſſander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and reſtoring all things to the ſame ſtate wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the party of Caſſander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly reuolted vnto him; as to an induſtrious man, and likely to preuaile in the end. Thus was the whole Country ſet in a combuſtion, vneaſie to be quenched; which preſented vnto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himſelfe Lord of Aſia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus ſeekes to make himſelfe an abſolute Lord: and thereupon treates with Eumenes, who diſappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipaters life time a firm reſolution, to make vnto himſelfe the vtmoſt benefit that he might of the Army committed to his charge. And in fair ſeaſon for aduancement of his purpoſes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the buſineſſe in Piſidia was diſpatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, ſaue onely the continuance of the ſiege of Nora, a ſmall thing of it ſelfe, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was moſt precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the preſent eſtate was manifeſtly ſubiect, would in continuance of ſome years (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that ſpace could worke againſt him. His moſt feare was that for want of exerciſe in that narrow Caſtle, his men & horſes might grow ſickly and vnſeruiceable: which made him to practiſe many deuiſes of keeping them in health and luſtie. But when he had continued ſhut vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good paſſe, and he was eaſed of his cares by Antigonus himſelfe, whoſe forces held him beſieged.

Antigonus knowing the great ſufficiencie of Eumenes, and conſidering his fidelitie ſhewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing thoſe high deſignes, wherein he doubted not that he ſhould be withſtood by the mightieſt Princes of the Empire. Hee ſent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with ſome part of his intent, and promiſing to make him a better Lord than euer hee had beene, and the next man to himſelfe, if things fell out as hee deſired: in regard whereof hee required onely his friendſhip, and thereupon ſent him an oath to take; which done, hee might at his good pleaſure iſſue ſafely out of Nora, and enioy his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruſing the forme of the oath, did perceiue the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words & ſumme of all were ſuch, as tied him faſt only to Antigonus, omitting all reſeruation of dutie to the King or any other. This hee liked not, holding it vnſeemely to become a ſworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the maſterie; and being aſſured that his voluntary aſſiſtance, which way ſoeuer hee gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the courſe propounded. Yet would he not therefore breake off for the negotiation, and waite for ſome better occaſion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but ſeeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to giue vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it ſelfe, when he came to take it, he made ſhew of diſlike, in that it was not ſolemne enough for such a designe as that was, who made hast by ordinary iourneys into Phrygia, to the end he might be ready to withstand the Allegiance, which the Gouernours of Prouinces had sworne to the Kings Maiestie, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe by gentle and milde courses, as well as by strong hand, to the performance of such parts

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as he came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue some of the Gouernours of the Prouinces, debating with himselfe according to his authority vnder the Kings hand, which he had receiued of diuers, vpon the title of warre: and they did likewise attend his presence, whether they should follow his proceedings. For he alone might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the dying man doting in his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, diuerse from the iudgement of the Princes, and Souldiers, why might not he himselfe also claime the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was graunted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme conuenient, whilest he liued, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death, and to giue a faire colour to his inuasion, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, he had three score thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceiued his drift, and prouided to resist him, was Aridæus Gouernour of Phrygia, who fortified the Townes of his own Prouince, and sought to haue won Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Town, and seated very conueniently for him, but was like to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to command him out of the Countrie. Aridæus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Cyzicus. Neuertheless finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long resistance, he tooke such companies as he could draw along with him, & so passed ouer into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Cleitus, who ruled in Lydia, & sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, & grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes hauing authoritie from the Court, raiseth warre against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus hauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to haue entred Macedon, and seized vpon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of these reasons. It would make bred greater iealousie in Cassander, as feare in Polysperchon, which might haue brought them to termes of reconciliation. It would aske more time than he could spare, and the issue which followed the Protector-ship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not onely refuse to take his part, but would make warre vpon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Army of twenty thousand foot, & foure thousand horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent vnto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should needs. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouernours of Prouinces, requiring them to giue assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or siluer-shielded bands, commandement was giuen to be at his appointment. Hee had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, before this authoritie was giuen him: but now hee purposed with all the strength which hee could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall bloud. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring helpe to her and to her Nephew the Son of Alexander: and if there was time to giue her his aduice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for hee was desirous deſirous to returne vnto Macedon, but ſuſpected his ambition, as not conſined within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counſelled her to remaine in Aſia, till ſuch time as he could bring the matter to a good iſſue, which alone, he promiſed her, his faithfull care ſhould not be wanting vnto the ſeede of Alexander.

Strange it is to conſider, that in all the Empire, ſcarce any one could be found among the Nobleſt ſort, in whom Alexanders mother, wiues, and children, might repoſe ſome confidence, ſauing onely this Eumenes, a ſtranger to the Macedonian bloud, borne at Cardia a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne diſcretion; and compelled he was to trauaile as farre as Phrygia, to gather together an Armie ſufficient to reſiſt the enemies that purſued his perſon.

CHAP. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon ſtood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Eurydice, whom ſhe cruelly puts to death.

NOW, foraſmuch as in this preſent Warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Aſia, but Macedon it ſelfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the royall houſe of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the Warre it ſelfe, to ſhew briefly how the great ones did mutually ſtand affected, and by what paſſions they were drawne into thoſe courſes, which ouer-threw moſt of them and out of their ruines built the groſſeſſe of a few as likewiſe to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it ſelfe about the meere controuerſie of the title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or ſhould haue beene depending.

Aridæus the King, beeing ſimple and affectleſſe, did onely what hee was bidden.

Perdiccas, deſirous to continue long in Office, had a purpoſe to aduance the ſonne of Alexander by Roxane to the kingdome, and become Gouernour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queene diſcouering plainely this intent, and meaning nothing leſſe than to let her husband ſerue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to ſit in it, grew acquainted with Caſſander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Caſſander held freſh in minde the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himſelfe by Alexander, who knocked his head againſt a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Perſian manner. The diſpleaſure hereof, and the pleaſure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to reſolue, both to ſuppreſſe the linage which he hated, and to maintaine his beloued miſtreſſe, either by ſupporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The reſt of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned ouer all, ſo as they might remaine their ſeuerall Countries, & eſtabliſh the in authority in ſuch wiſe, that it might not be taken from them.

Among theſe, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would haue ſuffered them to ſee it. Lyſimachus and Seleucus lying farre off, and being ſtrong, had ſome good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Againſt theſe, Peuceſtes, and ſome others, with much adoe hardly made reſiſtance, vntill ſuch time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himſelfe greater matters, which he liued not to accompliſh.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with ſtep-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wiues. It was thought that ſhe had giuen poyſon to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now ſhe conſidering, that Eumenes was too full of buſineſſe to come home ſo ſoone as ſhe wiſhed that he ſhould; and that Caſſander daily preuailed in Greece: thought it the beſt way to ioyne with Polyſperchon, and ſet vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the ſon of Roxane, remouing Aridæus before Caſſander were able to defend him. To this intent ſhe procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and ſo tooke her way towards Polyſperchon, who ioyning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydice hearing theſe newes, wrote very earneſtly to Caſſander, praying him to ſet aſide all other buſineſſe, and come to ſuccour her. She her ſelfe by entreatie, gifts and promiſes, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as ſhe could, vntill ſhe thought her owne ſide ſtrong enough; and then taking her husband with her, vvent boldly forth againſt Olympias, and the Traitor Polyſperchon.

Theſe two Queens met armed, as if the matter ſhould haue beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any ſtroke ſtricken, by the reuolt of thoſe who followed Eurydice. For as ſoone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias, calling to minde her former Eſtate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and ſonne, they refuſed to lift any weapon againſt her. Eurydice finding her ſelfe thus forſaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made priſoner with her husband.

Olympias hauing obtained this victory without bloud, thought that all things would ſucceed as eaſily, and vpon the ſame conſiderations for which they had refuſed to beare Armes againſt her, the Macedonians would not ſticke to maintaine her, whatſoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore ſhut vp Aridæus and his wife in a cloſe roome, where they could ſcarce turne round, ſhe fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare leſt the people ſhould haue commiſeration of him, that had reigned almoſt ſixe yeares and a halfe) to put them to death. So ſhe deliuered Aridæus to ſome barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice ſhe ſent a ſword, a halter, & a cup of poyſon, willing her to chooſe the inſtrument of her owne death, who praying that the like preſents might one day be ſent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, hauing ſpent her laſt curſes not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Caſſander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then chooſe out, all vvhom ſhe commanded to be ſlaine. His brother Iolaus that was already dead & buried, ſhe accuſed of poyſon giuen to Alexander, & thereupon cauſed his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be ſcattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themſelues, and the folly of Polyſperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the gouernement of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Caſſander was reuenged vpon Olympias.

†. 1.

The great expedition of Caſſander. Olympias ſhuts her ſelfe into Pydna, where Caſſander beſieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, comming to ſuccour Olympias, is forſaken, and baniſhed by his owne Subiects.

CAſſander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponneſus; vvhither when all theſe ill tidings vvere brought to him, he neuer ſtaied to take the Citie, nor to giue order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the ſonne of Polyſperchon vvere there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his aſſociates to looke to themſelues as well as they could, till his returne; and ſo in all haſte he tooke his iourney toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie deſire of iuſt reuenge. The Aetolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylæ, in fauour of the Queene and Polyſperchon, to hinder his paſſage; but he, not willing to miſ-ſpend any time in in dealing with them, got together as many shippes as he could, great and small, vvith which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he diuided his companies, appointing some vnder Callas, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polysperchon buried, who then lay incamped neere to Perrhabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, hauing once preuailed by the respect giuen to her dignitie, tooke more care how to appeare Maiesticall, than to make her selfe strong. To this end she made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, hauing in her companie all the flowre of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, & her young son Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minority kept the Soueraigne power in her own hands. But all this pompe serued to little vse, against the violence of the enemy, that soone presented himself before the wals; onely it fed the besieged with a vaine hope of succour, that would from all parts arriue, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished, and went away in smoake.

For Aeacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his cousen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuertheless, his Subiects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, & quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceede, and the obstinate refusall of the Armie, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vaine against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to haue preuailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and down in forraine Countries a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the meane time was closed vp streightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conueyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable seruice being done there, whilst great actions were mannaged abroad.

§. II.

A continuation of Olympias her storie. Polysperchon defeated. Extreame famine in Pydna. Olympias yeeldes to Cassander.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes & Antigonus in this place, leauing Olympias yet a while to the houre of her destiny; which growes the faster vpon her, because she may discerne it comming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things, not manifestly coherent with it; we will here (as elsewhere we haue done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when vve shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polysperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bin, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was sent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with mony, leauing him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre preuailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and saw-dust being giuen to the Elephants for prouender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, yeelded themselues to the enemie, and vvere by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Country. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wel-willers, that such as had reserued themselues to the euent, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Towne, that the liuing were euen poysoned with the noysome sent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be vnto her as a house of torment, and a Iaile, out of which she should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her & the other Ladies vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Cassander, who hauing set her safely out of the Haven, accounted himselfe as good as master of her body & goods of her own life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the kingdome, was yeelded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out for Aristonus (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the successe of some petty seruices wherein he had prouailed) began to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Cassander's fauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did so, and presently after was killed by his priuate enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

¶. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHen Olympias had now heard so rowfull tidings of all her friends, she herselfe was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperitie she called iustice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, & other necessaries, to saue her selfe by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her selfe, & tel her own tale, he dissembled no longer, but sent vnto her such men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, vnto two kings of Epirus, wife, & mother, vnto two the mightiest kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of vnreproueable chastitie; but her ambition was boundelesse, her hatred vnappeasable, and her furie in reuenge, most vnwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wiues and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought priuie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, hauing first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other aline in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the gouernment of Macedon. But God more seuere vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse, (which was his iustice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppressions done by him and others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

¶. IIII.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seekes to make himselfe King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Cassander gaue honourable buriall to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wiues; that by her he might haue some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young son to close prison, remouing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase loue, built a Citie, called by his own name Cassandria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twenty yeares waste, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leauing him therefore daily prouailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Prouinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

The iourney of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that ioyned with him.

EVmenes, hauing ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against Antigonus. He tooke his iourney through Celosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaime those Prouinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the poeple, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconuenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions, and their fidelity was so vnsteady, that he might more easily haue dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them, neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by constraint. Therefore he fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him a dreame, a time for their meeting, namely, in a rich pauilion, wherein an emptie throne vvas placed, as if Alexander himselfe had beene present at their consultations. Thus he bound himselfe from their vaine pride, but of their faith he could haue no assurance. Yet vvhen Ptolomie requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings vvarrant, vvhich Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey, not as reiecting the kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, who was condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes knowing well that he was not to rely vpon their assistance, vvho stood otherwise affected than his affaires required, and vvere not to bee dealt vvith by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand, through the Country of Babylon, in such vvise that Seleucus, hauing in vaine assailed to hinder him, by opening the sluces of Euphrates, vvas glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, vvho were glad of his comming, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleucus, and themselues. Yet the contention about superiority, grew very hot among them, euery one finding matter enough to feede his owne humour of selfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of assembling in one pauillion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being sure to follow that vvhich Eumenes propounded, vvho vvas both vviselt in giuing aduice, and best able to reward, by meanes of the authoritie giuen him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he won to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, comming to set vpon Eumenes, was driuen off with losse.

ANtigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Prouince of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and driue him further from the Kings treasures, vvhich vvord he kept there. To vvhich end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he remoued out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered, and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, vvith their men, he marched directly against the enemies, vvho were to giue battell. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, & was retired back toward Persia, keeping the Riuer of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he took. Before he came to Tygris it selfe, he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, vvhich he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them vvere drowned; very few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeelded themselues prisoners, in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieue them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off, and the heate of that Countrie in the dog dayes, breeding diseases in his Armie, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Python with him, (leauing Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to goe the neerest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, vvith his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battaile betweene him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would haue had them to enter vpon those Prouinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Siluer-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastvvard. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to diuide it selfe into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiuing whereunto those doings tended, suffred him a while to keep good cheare, till the time of war drew neere. Then did he faine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport whereof was, that Olympias, had vanquished Cassander, & sent ouer a great Armie vnder Polysperchon, to ioyne with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine ioy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by vvhom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to haue beene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and vpon the sodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a far off, could not refraine from giuing him deserued commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foote by a third part. The battaile vvas fought vvith variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was vncertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground wheron they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; vvhich was accounted the signe of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leasure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus vvas glad (hauing tarried but one day) to steale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

Of diuers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part hauing stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the side which had hitherto preuailed, beeing hindred by the equall authoritie of many, from pursuing all aduantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repaire himselfe he could finde no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him & them, the way was not long, being only nine daies iourny, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring 25. daies iourny, he forsook, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come vndiscouered. So therefore taking his iourny in the dead of winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not haue them descried a farre off. This commandement had been well obserued foure or fiue daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, & the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselues, being neer to their waies end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their comming, which being reported to Peucestas, and other Captaines, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betooke themselues to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleeue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith he occupied certaine tops of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there hee chose a conuenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tyred with a long and painful iourny. Therfore he resolued to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But after a while, considering that no enemie stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some inhabitants of that desert to bee taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hil-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had been so deluded. Therefore hee went against these troupes with great fury, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for hauing so deceiued him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arriued there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Armie was come, saue only Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who besides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent aboue two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, & so to defend himself as well as he could, for his horsemen, ouerlaied with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driuen to run away vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who sate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they receiued wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants vpon the backe, draue them to seeke their owne safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes, who though he knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

§. V.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Peucestes, and the other Captaines, guilty of their owne much insufficiency, were so transported with enuie, that they could no longer containe their vile thoughts, but held communication, as vpon a necessary point, how they might finde meanes to murder him.

Surely, it is great iniustice to impute the mischiefe contriued against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serue to counterpoyse great vertues; (the sense of euill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to finde good reason of the euills, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes haue no other cause than vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesie, of a very sweet conuersation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrew him, which euen they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly aduertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vsed to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he reuolued many things in his minde, being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might incourage him to seeke their helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbare either to lose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length he resolued to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

The last battaile betweene Antigonus and Eumenes.

THe Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke of beeing beholding to him for the victorie. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to ioyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice vnto the followers of Antigonus, That their wicked deede in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserued. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Siluer-shields were men of threescore or seuenty yeares old, and strengthened more by continuall exercise than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as hauing passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often beene beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensiue, and aduanced heauily, beauily, suspecting their owne cause, and fearing that the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gaue him cause of great hope, the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therefore himselfe and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did set forward couragiously against the Enemies, that were ready to giue him a sharp entertainment.

Eumenes took vnto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to preuent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sudden; and (withall) to giue proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Python, he bestowed the weakest of his Horse and Elephants, vnder one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retrait, expecting the euent of the other side.

So they ioyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe master of all; Eumenes, to dye an honourable death, or to win such a victory vpon his open enemies, as might giue him leisure and opportunity to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being euen in their owne opinions, far inferiour to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Siluer-shields, who slew aboue fiue thousand of them, losing of their owne not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly vpon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground vpon him, vntill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand fiue hundred Horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battell, leauing his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way vnto Antigonus himself. And though he failed of his purpose, yet with great slaughter he did so beat vpon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hindred the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscouered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not only haue defended them, but peraduenture haue surprised those which came to surprise them, and so haue done as good a piece of seruice as a better man. But he vvas gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in body and minde that he could not possibly giue an eye to euery place, being not well able to continue where he vvas.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe euery way ouer-charged, began to giue backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he vvould haue done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soon as he had any leisure to heare how things vvent: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that vvas not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recouer their owne goods, but to enrich themselues with the spoyles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to ioyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, vvhere he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By

By this, the night grew on, and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were deſirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceiued hope of doing ſomewhat more, & therfore taking halfe his horſemen, he waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other halfe he committed to Pithon, willing him to ſet vpon the Siluer-ſhields in their retrait, which yet he forbare to do, becauſe it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended, wherein Antigonus had not ſo much the better in horſe, as the worſe in foot: but the ſpoyle which he got by ſurpriſing his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loſſes.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and ſlaine.

Eumenes, comming into his Campe, and finding the Siluer-ſhields extreamely diſcontented with their misfortune, began to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recouering all with aduantage. For their braue demeanour that day had ſo cruſhed the enemie, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leſſe able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wildernesſe, ouer the high mountaines.

But theſe perſwaſions auailed nothing. Peuceſtes was gone; the other Captaines would needes return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no deſire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Siluer-ſhields, (who had in former times readily conſented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as hee thought, a fit occaſion of making himſelfe great, and winning the loue of thoſe bands, dealt ſecretly with Antigonus, requeſting him to reſtore vnto thoſe old Souldiers their goods, which hee had taken, being the onely reward of their ſeruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a ſubtile man, knew very wel, that they which requeſted more than they had reaſon to expect, would alſo with little entreatie, performe a great deale more than they promiſed; and therefore he louingly entertained the meſſengers, filling them with hopes of farre greater matter than they deſired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were ſeduced to make warre againſt him. This anſwer pleaſed them ſo well, that they forthwith deuiſed how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more ioy of their victorie, than ſorrow of their loſſe, which they ſaid they would redeeme by another fight; in the mideſt of this goodly talke, they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his ſword, & bound him faſt. So they haled him away; and ſtopping their eares againſt all perſwaſions, would not yeeld ſo far, as to looſen one of his hands and let him kill himſelfe, but brought him aliue (that was their own Generall, vnder whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The preſſe of men, running out of the Campe to ſee him, was ſo great, that Antigonus was faine to ſend a guard of horſemen and Elephants, to keep him from being ſmothered; whom he could not ſuddenly reſolue, either to kill or ſaue. Very few they were that ſued for his life; but of theſe, Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus was one; the reſt were deſirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were ſaued, he would ſoone be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the ſafeſt way, to put him to death; which intending to haue done by famine (perhaps becauſe he would keepe it a while in his owne power, to reuerſe the ſentence, as deſiring, if it might be, to haue him liue his friend) haſte of other buſineſſe made him do it by the ſword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy Generall Eumenes; who had with great wiſedome, fidelity, & patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purpoſed to caſt down. Hee is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his gouernment of himſelfe, in all her changes. Aduerſitie neuer leſſened his courage, nor Proſperitie his circumſpection. But all his vertue, induſtrie, and wit, were caſt away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill anſwered, by Gaſpar de Colignie, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which enſued ſoon after in the maſſacre sacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserued vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Siluer-shields he burnt aliue; many of the other Captaines he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Siluer-shields, that had betraied so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into farre Countries, vnder pretence of warres; but with a priuie charge, to consume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beate vpon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he remoued Gouernours of Prouinces, and made himselfe Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

THe two Armies being ioyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentiuely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Python began to consider his owne deseruings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Prouince. Besides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he iudged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course, he was driuen by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were vnsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discouered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissension betweene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom he meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his eares, did finely delude Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Gouernor; and the loue of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offensiue warre. But what need had he to vse the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to diuide the Prouinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such diuision. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out of hand. For Antigonus, hauing begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe indifferently all that stood in his way; but swamme carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions; thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so diuided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he vnderstood his owne mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owne pleasure, Gouernours in all Prouinces, leauing none in Office, that were not his own creatures, exception such as lay too farre off to be dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceiued, hauing to doe with one that could not be taken with such baites: he was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer after tooke effect. Thus he, that enuied the vertue of his friend, was driuen to flatter (in vaine) the fortune of his enemie, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely a man forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gaue proofe of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of Susa to meete him on the way, rendring vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though hauing in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleeue it; but vsed him with excessiue kindnesse, for feare so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Iewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of mony, made vp 25. thousand talents. Hauing all this, he might well account himselfe a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed, therefore he proceeded, with intent to leaue no Country behinde his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeming the Maiestie of a king. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuennues of that Prouince. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable, saying, That it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prouince, which was giuen vnto him, in respect of his many good seruices to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should finde such issue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fifty horse, he conueied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions, desiring him to protect him from such a man as went about to oppresse all that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight, for now all those Countries were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence, and to kill him it was not his desire, hauing receiued many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any iniuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophesie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himselfe, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie beleeuers may giue credit to this tale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should haue hanged those Chaldeans, for giuing him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preserued for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he tooke his iournie into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took vp ten thousand talents more of the kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearely in-come to amount vnto eleuen thousand Talents.

Chap. V.

Of the great Warre betweene Alexanders Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

The combination of Ptolomie, Cassander, and others against Antigonus. Their demands and his answer.

THis great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new Warre. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had priuily combined themselues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good parts and hope giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them seuerally, entreating them to continue some time in their loue towards him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good army should preuaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, & was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much reioyce at his victory obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which warre, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must haue endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had preuailed; they held it very iust, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all aduenturers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equall diuision of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some conuenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to euery mans liking, if he would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; & Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those westerne Prouinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had beene driuen so iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

good

Antigonus knew, that after many losses receiued, he should yet be able to redeeme peace whensoeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weake, to giue away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to finde them worke more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, hauing by his meanes kept their gouernments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polysperchon, and the councell of estate in Macedon. But what maruell was it, if they considered not how he had saued them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitiue, and begging succour, he was by his meere bounty relieued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those daies command me to surrender Prouinces, and giue him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pitty him, and helpe him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an Army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof he now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did vse him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserued ill: else he would not haue fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly iustifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

The preparation and beginnings of the warres.

When the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but Warre. Antigonus perceiuing that he should be inuaded from Europe, as soone as hee was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coasts, & hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giuing him also in charge, to driue out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece & Cyprus, not vnfurnished of money, to draw friends to his side, & raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially he laboured to make himself the ſtrongeſt by Sea; to which purpoſe he rather haſtened, than foreſlowed his iourny into Syria, that he might get poſſeſſion of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, hauing erected Beacons, and laid poſt-horſes throughout all Aſia, to giue ſwift aduertiſement of all occurrences, he inuaded Syria, that was not held againſt him by any power ſufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the ſtrength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Prouinces he kept with a few Garriſons, better ſeruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemy. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Country, and began to ſet great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ſhips, which was one of his moſt earneſt cares. In theſe buſineſſes he conſumed a yeare and three moneths, not idlely. For he took Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his diſcretion, and well vſed. The ſtrong city of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it ſelfe vpon compoſition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not aſleep, whileſt theſe things were in doing, though he kept himſelfe within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behooued him to do. His forces were not able to ſtand againſt Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increaſe, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuertheleſſe by Sea (where his enemy was as yet vnready) he ſent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus paſſed with an hundred ſaile along the coaſt of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little diſcomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then gouerned by many petty Lords; of whom the greateſt adhered to Ptolomy; the reſt were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with ſharp ſteele.

The ſame commodity of aide by Sea encouraged the Preſident of Caria (called alſo Caſſander, but not the ſon of Antipater, howſoeuer by the painfull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is by ſome ouerſight, counted for the ſame) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and buſily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enioyed reſt; but now he threw himſelfe into dangerous warre, chooſing rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall vnder certaine ruine, though ſomewhat further diſtant, which would haue ouerwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reſt.

§. III.

How each party ſought to winne the aſſiſtance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration againſt Caſſander. Alexander the ſonne of Polyſperchon reuolteth from Antigonus who had ſet him vp.

IN the meane ſeaſon all care poſſible was taken on both ſides, to aſſure vnto them the people of Greece, whoſe aide, which way ſoeuer it inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the firſt, Antigonus ſped ſo well by large effuſion of his treaſure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponneſians, of whom hee waged eight thouſand, & cauſed Polyſperchon (who had a good while made hard ſhifts) to rowſe himſelfe again, and taking vpon him the title of Captain of Peloponneſus, to make head againſt Caſſander.

Theſe hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the ſame kinde. Wherefore to make Caſſander the more odious, he called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks & Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To theſe he declared, that Caſſander had very cruelly ſlaine Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had ſhut vp in cloſe priſon the poore Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his ſonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a deſire to make himſelfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Theſſalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match vnfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere deſpight of thoſe dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Caſſandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treaſon of the inhabitants, was leuelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute libertie the Lady Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant General of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himselfe was vnderstood) or else should be repured a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should bee restored into freedome; this hee did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others of the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wise to be deceiued with vaine shewes. His vndertaking for the libertie of the Greeks was more effectual, and got easie beliefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomie stroue to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded men farre more seruiceable in war, than were to be found in any Prouince of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to haue all sure, deceiued himselfe, not without great cost. For hee gaue to Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon fiue hundred talents, willing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much bloud shed, grieuously afflicted the contrary faction; and he himself perceiuing that they were more easily spoyled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not onely to win the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured, he thought it a part of wisedome, to surrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could not auaile himself to hold any long time before. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie, telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the eares, concerning who preuailed, but onely desiring to haue them weary themselues, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set vpon the stronger. Therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his hand the fiue hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receiue the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, should be freely put into his hands by Cassander. Prouided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, & enter into a sure & faithfull league with Ptolomy, Cassander, & the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himselfe, that the Country which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud mutinous man, to fitting himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had liued a while with Antigonus since the beginning of these wars, among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, which he did not carry very secret of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer, and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subiect vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by reason of the Sicyonians, who thinking thereby to haue made themselues free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. Who in reuenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight, and hauing by seuerity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Administration in good order, and gouerned those places that she held, with the commendation of her Subiects and Neighbours.

§. IV.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in fauour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-army of Antigonus, vtterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. Antigonus drawes neere to Greece.

ANtigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other aduersaries in Greece, by stirring vp the Ætolians against them: Likewise he laboured to winne to his party the Ilands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deale with Ptolemy, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Ætolians, a factious Nation, & alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Cassander wan some of their owne Country; fortified the Acarnanians against them, & compelled Glaucias, King of the Illyrians, whom hee vanquished in battaile, to forsake their side, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many petty Ilands were drawne to ioyne with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians vnder Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army vnder conduct of Pausilaus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite ouerthrowne by Ptolomies Nauie. Polyperchon, who in Ptolomies behalfe had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his seruice in that Country, because Alexander was come ouer to their side, returned homewards, & by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Hee rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Pausilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, & many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiuing this, made all haste to help his fellowes that were on Land; but whilest he with all his Fleet were intentiue onely to that businesse, Polyperchon appeered at their backs; who as soon as he perceiued their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behinde, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomy: so the parley was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to haue indifferently sped in the warre, and thereby to haue equall cause of hope and feare. This late victory with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the mishap of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the confederacy, made between the Ætolians & him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his aduantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerse to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, mony, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, wherof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoyze the bad, he meant to proceed as reason should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them that want no money.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to feare, lest the people being tied vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon some occasion reuolt from him to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To preuent this, and to be nearer Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaires did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therfore he left part of his Army in Syria vnder his son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty years old, he appointed many ancient Captaines or assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

After the comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the whole processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to so much as thinke vpon molesting him in Asia; they themselues were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relyed vpon Antigonus, who was to help them with mony and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, hauing Æacides lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto the Rebels no time to confirme themselues. Hee suddainly presented himselfe before many of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne vnto their former duty. Hee fought a battaile with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Country. Finally, hee ouercame Seuthes; and following the heate of his victory, slew Pausanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had sent ouer with an Army, and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For hee wasted their Country; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them: and after the victory, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Æacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, he draue the Ætolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wilde Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his aduersaries with painfull trauaile; after which they remained only sauers. Antigonus himselfe at faire leisure wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cassanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firme Land, were by those meanes won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to giue them the liberty in deed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine haue shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terrour hee forced Cassander to repaire thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leauing many good Townes of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselues, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the aduantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Country; draue his Garrisons out of diuers Cities; forced the Gouernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkeable. For Thebes had not long before bin raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the loue of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miserable nullity, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or neerenesse of Antigonus gaue life to his affaires in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designes of his enemies, taking aduantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great workes in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeare preceding he had ouer-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wauered betweene contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his owne person easily reduced them to a more setled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leauing a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Gouernour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet hee ran alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria & Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherwith his Fathers subiects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed Foote with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did hee tire himselfe and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether hauing lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, he would return vpon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he leuied with all conuenient speed, for the recouery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for seruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, vvhen the newes arriued of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Army, to giue him battaile. Hereupon he called to counsaile his principall friends, who aduised him to giue way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future: being a young man, and weakly furnished with meanes to resist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomy & Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weighty enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Cõmanders. Neither found he much reason that should moue him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serue to adorne his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolued to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome iourny ouer the Deserts of Arabia.

Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Prouince, as Egypt, came so well prouided of all necessaries, that their Army felt not any great grieuance of the euil way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they vndertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vtterly vnprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chaines, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seeke to breake vpon it, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, (which (besides that they had aduantage in multitude) vvere heartened with many fortunate seruices, by them performed that yeare, whilest the enemies had wearied themselues, either with vaine iournies, or long and dulling expectation,) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight began, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part striuing striuing more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as hauing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the terrour of Demetrius, who vpon no necessity would needes fight a battaile vvith disadaantage, began to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, hauing more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight shee vvas idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men by the losse of his Elephants, was bad lucke. Those beasts were in that kinde of warre hardly to be resisted on plaine ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and euery one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horse-men of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, & preuailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lye vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they began to shrinke, and many of them to prouide for their safety by timely flight, vvhich example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strouen so long in vaine to make his men abide, that he himselfe was likely to be lost; he was faine to giue place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battaile. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to saue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and cloyed vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already stolen; Ptolomies Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This victory restored vnto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keep; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betwen Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Cœlosyria & Phœnicia, some Townes held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus & Sidon; of which Sidon was giuen vp by the Inhabitants: Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captaine, vvho trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recouered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Æra of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed this businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus tooke leaue of him, and went vp to Babylon, to try his owne fortune; which he found so fauourable, that recouering first his owne Prouince, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine consisted of no more than eight hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to haue been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he caried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwel within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough, whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouernour, that none of them would finde courage to resist him; but left that worke to Antigonus owne men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, vvhich by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselues ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselues into the Townes of most importance: for euery man of them should haue been troubled vvith domestick enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who reuolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that they did no more than ſeeke to make good one ſtrong place, wherein were kept the Hoſtages and Priſoners, that Antigonus held for his ſecurity in thoſe quarters. This Caſtle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leiſure, againſt dangers, that were not then apparant. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and ſo got the entire poſſeſſion of Meſopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had beſtowed in Media and Perſia, forces conuenient for defence of thoſe Prouinces, that were the vtmoſt of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Army lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into thoſe parts; hee found little impediment in the reſt of his buſineſſe. Hauing now gotten what he ſought; it behooued him to ſeeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too ſmall, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, ioyning vnto himſelfe, out of Perſia and other Countries all needfull help, came, with ten thouſand Foot, and ſeauen thouſand Horſe, either to ſaue all from being loſt, or to driue Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Againſt this power, Seleucus had onely foure hundred Horſe, and ſomewhat aboue three thouſand Foote, wherewith to oppoſe himſelfe: his large Conqueſt of warlike Nations hauing yeelded him many louing Subiects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neere to the Riuer of Tygris, hee withdrew himſelfe from the place where his reſiſtance was expected, into certaine mariſhes not farre off; where he lay ſecretly waiting for ſome aduantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the leſſe carefull in fortifying his Campe. In recompence of this vaine ſecurity, his Campe was taken by ſurpriſe, the firſt night of his arriuall; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Perſia, together with ſundry of the Captaines, were ſlaine; hee himſelfe was driuen to flee for his life into the Deſarts, and the whole Army yeelded vnto Seleucus: whoſe gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Suſiana, and the Neighbour Prouinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further ſtroke ſtricken.

This victory of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new ſtile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vſed by the Iewes, Chaldæans, Syrians, and other Nations in thoſe parts. I will not make any long diſputation about the firſt yeare of this Æra. The authority of that great Aſtrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeale, makes it plaine, that the fiue hundred and nineteenth yeare of Nabonaſſar, was the foureſcore and two yeare of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needleſſe, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the firſt of theſe yeares was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of foure hundred thirty and eight yeares after Nabonaſſar. With the obſeruation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting, finding the ſame Planet to haue been ſo placed in the ſigne of Virgo, as the Chaldæans had obſerued it, in the ſame year; which was from Nabonaſſar the fiue hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the foureſcore and two yeare; and the laſt of the hundred thirty and ſeuenth Olympiad. Theſe obſeruations of the Celeſtiall bodies, are the ſureſt markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcuſable. As for ſuch occurrences in Hiſtory, and the yeares of ſucceeding Princes (that are not ſeldome ambiguous, by reaſon of vnremembred fractions) if they ſeem to bee here-againſt, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that theſe years of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the ſeuerall Authors of the two Books of the Machabees, who follow diuers accompts. He that ſhall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other ſupputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than 150 yeares diſtance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomy left all her wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed vnto the Macedonians, by those that had beene subiect vnto the Persian Empire. Of diuers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill successe.

IN a happy houre did Seleucus aduenture to goe vp to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staied longer vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hauing lost the battaile at Gaza, receiued from Ptolomy all his owne goods, his Pages, and Seruants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherin they would seek to right themselues after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troups, drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Prouinces thereabouts, and aduertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour lost. Antigonus vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy had won vpon a beardlesse Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nethelesse follow his owne businesse in Coelosyria: thinking it enough to spend part of his Army vnder Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much vndervalued the power of such an Enemy. He thought that this young Gallant, hauing lately saued his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of hauing a faire way at his backe, than aduenturous in setting further forward, than vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all feare, as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march, he tooke the lightest of his Army, and made his iourny with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the suddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him alue, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit serued not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall fauour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakened by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldened by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomy, and therfore he fortified himselfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprise, wherein he might perceiue, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driuen to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeede, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all hast, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For he reioyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good fortune imployed by his son, whom from this time forwards, he imployed in matters of greatest importance. For the Princes, how great soeuer they may seeme, are neuer so willing to hazard their estates, as when they know lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming. Wherefore he kept the Campe of Demetrius. For he made it a matter of consultation, as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt; alleaging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceiue to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensiue warre. So he departed out of Syria; preserning his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddaine passion of feare: and he departed at faire leisure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his backe, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Prouince.

We may iustly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, & many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had ouer-run, with so hasty a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; betweene Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineue; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to haue once beene in those people, which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselues to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and againe recouered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the seuerall States of Greece (many of which had neuer possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swel beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to haue them rather friends than seruants, for feare of further inconuenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwayes beene subiect vnto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had vtterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselues all soueraigne power, or high authority, the life and spirit of euery Estate, they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when the Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satraps, or Princes of that Empire, did not, when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, striue to lay hold vpon those Prouinces, which had many ages bin subiect vnto them, & scarce foure years in quiet possession of their enemies; oh why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesse reason to suspect the History, than authority to confute it. For we seldome reade, that any small Kingdome, prouailing against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeares, as left vnto the vanquished no hope of recouery, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vtter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of ciuill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiauell; and concerneth all other Kingdomes, that are subiect vnto the like forme of Gouernment: the summe whereof is this, Where soeuer the Prince doth hold all his Subiects vnder the condition of slaues, there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile so farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren, he vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine: the whole Empire would quickly be won, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soeuer they may seeme, are meere slaues: nor is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose person all regard, could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein he no of priuate ambition should not

countervaile all apparant matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mighty in their seuerall Countries, and hauing certaine Royalties and Principalities of their owne, are able to raise Warre in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will alwayes stirre vp and inflame them: so that vntill euery one piece were won, and euery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobility, brought vnder or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor wel assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such assistants are not so easily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and hauing what they would, they soone returne to their old allegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they haue, vnlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherin it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needs not to feare any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greatest mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of some frontier Towne, or the wilfull losse of a battaile: vvhich done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either flye to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgiues the Captaine, that hath not strined by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselues vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them haue any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subiect vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now is this base condition of the principall men, doth leaue vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselues against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aduersity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Bassaes, or Prouinciall Gouernours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse & vtter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foote of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subiect, which is also a Kingdom vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other deuice painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slauery.

As in the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, voide of liberty in the Subiects, and vtterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended vpon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that ioyned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safety in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Vncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaues, and so did stile themselues, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon euery light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to bee discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes vpon his owne brother Masistes, which hath been formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the Satraps, or Gouernours of the Prouinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, prouing them to haue beene meer slaues: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the generall want of liberty conuenient among the people: a matter no lesse auaileable, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiauel. For as Æsope his Asse did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heauier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst vnder their owne Princes, are not greatly fearfull of a forraigne yoke;

Nor

Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they gouerned more mildely than the French: this enlarged the Venetian iurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Townes that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressours: and this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been subiect vnto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed vpon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had been subiects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparant. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them vnder, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell vpon the Nabathæans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherin they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrre, Frankincense, & other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with fiue hundred talents of siluer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was sudden & vnexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, the Nabathæans ouertook them, & finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, onely fifty horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of a waste Wilderness, lacke of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he lost not much honour: for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabathæans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceiued hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Ptolomy: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great & wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, wherby Syria and the lower Asia should haue been exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius with fifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his son did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselues from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than he could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigonus had laid vpon his son a peremptory commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnsetled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vaine to striue against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leauing behinde him fiue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more than nothing, forsooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

THese ambitious heads, hauing thus wearied themselues with vneffectual trauaile, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no priuate hatred, but meere desire of Empire had moued them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulnesse growing vpon the slow aduancement of their seuerall hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better serue to fight againe.

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Prouinces which euery man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a false colour, to the businesse; That the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King, when he came to full age; and, That all the States of Greece should be set at liberty. The aduancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kingdome, seemes to haue bin a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discouered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Cassander. For in his custody was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their late renowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine ouer a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Prouinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridaus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their liberty. This liberty had hitherto beene the subiect of much idle discourse: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarce any Towne of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if he should set free, he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greeke seas, together with a great Armie, and mony enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold vp the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as euer they had beene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equall to them all in puissance. Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe without all: for where euery one mans helpe is necessary to the warre, there may any one make his own peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subiects, vnto any man; much lesse to the sonne of an Asiatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the childe and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yeelding vp his gouernment, which he must haue done when the childe had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beauty, vvhich vvas perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to haue her sonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediatly vpon the death of Alexander, she had vsed the fauour (if it were not lothe) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her owne bloudy malice, vpon Statira the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wiues is held no crime. For, hauing by a counterfeit letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, she did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; euen at such time, as the neer approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselues free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherin euery one perswaded himselfe of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had worke enough at home) began to rowze themselues: as if now the time were come, for each man to improue his owne stocke. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the liberty of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomy, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomy complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at liberty. Vnder colour of redressing this enormity, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he wan foure Townes, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his enemies.

After this, putting to Sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: & in that voyage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his seruices) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had been to his owne Vncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at liberty, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the loue of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selfe: where hauing set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired work, that Cratesipolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polysperchons son, gaue vp into his hands the Towns of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomy had conceiued a vaine beliefe that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart, and rise vp in armes: whereby with little labour, their liberty might be gotten; & he be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long seruitude had well neere extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in pursuit therof; but sate idlely still, as wishing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Towne with walls, trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, & the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Towne and Territory.

The Athenians were become as humble seruants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: erecting as many statuaes in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the yeare. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; & he gouerned them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set ouer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomy could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliuer them from thraldome; as iudging the commodity that would arise by annexing them to his party, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Cassander should receiue thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus took the worke in hand. But when he found such difficulty in the businesse, he changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his owne possession.

Before the comming of Ptolomy into Greece, Cassander had beene held occupied with very much vvorke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: making his owne aduantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger, & made those those murders which he had committed seemed lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polysperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the reigne of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her Childe, enter againe vpon the Stage, leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had beene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time the death of his brother had moued such compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders onely lawfull childe, had procured vnto him such good will, that the demand which Polysperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that ioyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not beene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceiued to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polysperchon himself, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he preuailed so far, that the old Villaine was contented to murder his Pupill; choosing rather with many curses, and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble fame with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and liuing Soueraignes.

Antigonus had not all this while been asleepe, though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witnesses, of his hauing beene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for the recouerie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieued him, to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerfull, or to see Polysperchon and Ptolomie sweat, in a busie warre against Cassander. If they would haue continued their quarrels, he could well haue affoorded them leisure, and haue thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded that when the rest had wearied themselues in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceipts, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to reuolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne should haue depended. Against this enuie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedy, such as was like to giue him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister vnto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: vvhom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoeuer she discouered much vnwillingnesse thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compulsiue meanes: either because his fancie, being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could haue made small vse of her, by doing such apparant wrong. She had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia; hoping belike, to finde a new husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe vvith prouiding her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie vvidow, suffered her bloud, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a iest: saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay in a manner, voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many seeke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired onely a proper man, with whom she might leade a merry life. To this purpose did she inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wiues already; Ptolemy had many wiues, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wiues, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindred not his suite: peraduenture it aduanced it, by giuing to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therfore she bequeathed her self, and vvas taking her iourny from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolfe by the eares: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. She would not be his vvife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had bin the vvay, by vvhich he might haue incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Lady lesse respected than Alexanders own sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enioy the commoditie of so faire a title to the kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischieuous conspirers against the life of that good Lady. So vvas Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we need not aske: for seldome is that bloody crime vnreuealed, and neuer so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it vvas extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods iustice, due vnto the cruelty of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherfore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soone after cast down, ouer-whelming themselues or their children, vvith the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, gaue libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrisons of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left aliue, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Prouinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselues Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbeare it: neither seemed it conuenient in the iudgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatnesse by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therfore to vndertake a plausible enterprise, euen the liberty of Greece: whereby it was apparant, that he might get such honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royalty, vvhereof in seeming modestie, he vvas not couetous. To this purpose, he deliuered a strong Armie, with a Nauie of two hundred and fiftie saile, and fiue thousand talents of siluer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bin arriued. But when it was knowne, both who he vvas, and vvhat vvas the cause of his comming; the ioy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forsooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia stroue to make good that piece, vvhich after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselues, to the obseruance of generall commended rules; in lesser things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Lady Cratesipolis lay in Patræ, and had great desire to see Demetrius: nothing belike that she might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomy; to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered mony for the surrender of them. Yet the onely businesse pretended was loue. He being addressed, left his footemen in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a company of his lightarmed, for guard of his person, made a long journie to meete with her. This troupe, being caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her vvhen she came, so closely as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge whereby they conceiued good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might ouerthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus: that bring him to any tearmes of reason, by taking his deare sonne prisoner. Their proiect fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly vpon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himself in a old cloake, and creepe away disguised, leauing them to ransacke his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions, especially an extreame dissolute wanton pleasures and a painefull industry in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; excellent in deuising Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to resist his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For aduersitie made his valour more admired, prosperity puffed him with ouerweening, wherein he thought, that he might do what he list. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till she had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as shall heereafter be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolued no longer to attend the slow proceeding of siege, to assaile Athens by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, vnwillingly was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that battered the walls, preuailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within, and won the place in two dayes. The walls, and all the defence of that piece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground, & so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was giuen their liberty, with promise to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill & industry. But the Athenians, hauing forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make vp that defect with their tongues: conuerting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had sufed vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they consecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their Citie, and built thereon an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the alighter; they called them by the Names of the gods their Sauiours, ordaining that euery yeare, their should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadours, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods, as were they, whom they sent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the young Prince, but made that acclamation, which best would haue pleased the old man, to be of no vse. For he could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse he would seeme to approue their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he so tickled with his their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, & Timber to build ships, he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheate, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolomy in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius tooke vpon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a businesse of greater difficulty; meaning to employ his seruice against Ptolomy, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should create all matters concerning the common good of the Country. About the same time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Athens, committing their libertie entire, into the peoples hands, whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greeches, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that he should conquer his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his enemies.

A pitifull Tragedy had lately happned in Cyprus, through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, king of Paphus, was entred into some practice with Antigonus; yet not so farre, that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off his negotiation, and the false hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither: who surrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleare himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessity, caused the vnhappie King to rid himselfe of life: and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew her selfe, but perswaded the wiues of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those Brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the sodainnesse of this calamity, did shut vp the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselues together.

Whatsoeuer the crime obiected was, Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserued the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieued, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest remoued occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cyprians did little or nothing against him: either because they had smal strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselues haue the rule of their owne Country. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Army, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within the wals of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the present was the fidelity of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution haue stood long, against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of battery, if Ptolomie had not hasted to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Army and Carriages. This Fleete made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre; though more than halfe of it was vnfit for seruice, in fight at Sea. Wherfore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatning message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse he would be ouerwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young Gallant repaied him with words of as much bravery, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomy; better stored with weapons fit for that seruice;

uice, and very well furnished with Engines in the prow, to beate vpon the enemie. Nathelesse he stood in great doubt of three score Gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, least Menelaus with them should set vpon his backe: which if it were very likely that all should go very ill with him. Against this mischiefe, he bestowed two of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth: and setting his horsemen on the shore, to giue what assistance they could, to wit the rest of his Fleete put to Sea against Ptolemie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other, but held each of them the left wing of his own fleete. Each of them preuailed against the squadron where with he was combated, but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselues to speedy flight. As for Ptolemie, hee was faine to leaue his aduantage vpon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieue & animate those of his own which needed him in another. Wherein he found his losse ouer great to be repaired, by continuing any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to saue himselfe, in hope of better euent that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell no vnusuall accident, yet was the victorie greater than could haue been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-seruice, which the Greekes and Phanicians, that were with Demetrius, had, aboue those which followed Ptolemie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse than in the quality of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably iudge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so do, yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceits, wil commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to think themselues abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelaus issuing with his fleete out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was vtterly frustrate. He was kept-in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar vp the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight, especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that finde some part of their fears vaine, do easily gather hopeful spirits, and conceiue an opinion of their own ability, to do more than they thought vpon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatsoeuer the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolemie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer striue against the violence of fortune, but yeelded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand foote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same deiection of spirit was found in the common Souldiour, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land, none of them reposing any more confidence in Ptolemie, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whose Army they now increased.

It was generally beleeued, that much more depended on the euent of this fight, than the Ile of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherfore the common expectation was great, especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deepely perplexed with cares, thinking euery day a yeare, till he were aduertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himselfe of a tricke, whereby to double the welcome of his ioyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship, and so all alone, he went forward looking very sadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arriuall (for it was not known whence he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger, to meete him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this

Chap. VI.

Of the Warres betweene the kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: vntill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

S. I.

ALL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as beseeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, he resolued to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others, who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: likewise a fleet of a hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land-forces he commanded in person: of the Nauy Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was ready for the iourney, the Sea-men aduised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the setting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, reiected this counsaile, imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherfore he departed from Antigonia (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that vvas soone changed into that, by his mortall enemie) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to preuaile more than by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie tenne dayes prouision of victuals, and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deserts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casium, which is neere adioyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore, in ill case, and many shippes wanting. It had beene sorely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were lost, others driuen backe to Gaza, or scattered elsewhere into such creekes as they could recouer: Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremity, he and all his must haue perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers receiued reliefe. After these painfull trauailes, there followed a warre no lesse painfull than to little purpose; for Ptolomy had so fortified all the passages vpon the Riuer of Nilus, as he assured himselfe either to end the warre there, or if his guardes should happen to be forc't, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Assailers, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertain the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood he had none to warme it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the Riuer in vaine, Ptolomy assaied the faith of his Souldiers, with good successe; for with great gifts & greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast; as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemy, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his armie further off, from the noise of their entertainment, that had already bin won from him. To preuent therfore as wel the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a forc't retrait, he secretly practised the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burthen must be laid of his entrance, and leauing Egypt.

It is indeede lesse preiudiciall in such like cases, that errours, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Counsellors & Captaines, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious, than that of a Vassall. Charles the fift, as many other Princes haue done, laid the losse and dishonour he receiued in the inuasion of France, by the way of Prouence, to Antonie de Leua, whether iustly or no, I know not; but howsoeuer, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow therof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainly to giue any violent aduice in doubtfull enterprises is rather a testimony of loue, than of wisdome, in the giuer; for the ill successe is alwaies cast vpon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I haue sometime known it, that great Commanders, vvho are for the present in place of Kings, haue not onely beene dissuaded, but held, in a kind by strong hand, from hazarding their own persons, and yet haue those kinde of Mutiners neuer been called to a Marshals Court.

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a solemne Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus Lysimachus, and Cassander his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensiue Warre. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himself vvith another interpretation, calling the ioyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, hauing lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retraite. Howsoeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affayres henceforth in another fashion; for that which he could not cleaue a-sunder by great blowes, he purposed by little and litle to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he resolued (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, vvhom the forenamed Confederates should be forc'd either to relieue, or to loose; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and hauing long held it self in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therin a great deale of riches to it selfe; to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed shippes, by which it not onely beate off all Pyrates and pettie Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or ioyne themselues to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Egyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, and neighbourhood was fearefull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparant; gaue argument of quarrell to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by pettie iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the warre against them, openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terror vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance & seruice, against whomsoeuer. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by feare, & not by loue; raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to bee imposed vpon a State already conquerred, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained assistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, & made them resolue to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bondmen, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselues fellow-slaues with them.

Demetrius hauing refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batterie; in the inuention and vse of which, he did neuer shew himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults giuen them for a whole yeare, after many braue sallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proued farre more extreame, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recouered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which he himselfe ledde as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed & indangered Athens it selfe. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous vndertakings vpon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Ætolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by setting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, than that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander; but for Ptolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they receiued their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gaue the same fair answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heeles, so was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the soile: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselues with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius preuailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against Antigonus.

Demetrius comming with a strong Fleet and Army into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylæ. Herein his reputation did much auaile him; which was so great, that fiue thousand of his enemies Souldiers reuolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recouered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giuing liberty vnto the people, he bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to blocke them vp. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for he suddenly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his owne name Demetrius. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure. At the Isthmian games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had beene in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) hee despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, saue himselfe or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour he was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, he deserued none other name than of a drunken Pallard. Yet were the Athenians ready as euer to deuise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and iust with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, lest the war should fall heauily vpon him in Macedon: which to auoid, he knew no better way than to make peace with his Enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadours; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselues; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomy and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Prouinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with ioynt forces they should all together set vpon the common Enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flocke of birds are driuen away with a stone. With these conceipts he pleased himselfe, & no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies, lying at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully prouiding to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Asia, while he himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, began to make hot Warre vpon the subiects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to ioyne with him by faire meanes; winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To represse this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hasty iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to driue Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping ping himselfe the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was farre off, and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, & bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonus bin so forward, that he refused to yeeld vpon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leysure, which Antigonus had giuen him) and with great aid from Ptolomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driuen to leaue any part of his Army for defence of the Countrie; and that his iourny might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so ridde of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league haue done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, euery one found meanes to cleere himselfe of all incumbrances else where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

How Antigonus was slaine in a great battaile at Ipsus, neere vnto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

Seleucus, with his sonne Antiochus, ioyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which vvas (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than vnequall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them vnder with a mastering spirit, and had bin reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a braue Commander, hauing giuen proofe of his worth in many great seruices of all kinds, and inriched the Art of war with many inuentions, which euen his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, & fearefully stolen away from him to saue his life; with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this iournie; and Lysimachus; that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines vnder Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough, to receiue any benefit that fortune might giue, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy & well exercised: many of them hauing serued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty yeares had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreame danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could discerne no other necessitie of fighting, than the obstinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. Antigonus had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fifteene Elephants. His enemies were sixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of fiue hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of warre; which helpes, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensiue, communing much in priuate friendes with his former actions he commended the worthy minde of his Souldiers, for that when they had neuer been so iocund, as rewarded with the victorie of battle, nor they euer accustomed to make diuision, or any other matter of account, before it required execution. Of this token, it did vnluckily betide him, for going the night afterwards drunke, he broke his necke in a ditch, as he returned to the place of banquet, a base goddesse in many great fights; and therefore likely to haue been thrust into the table, if any maker, thereby resembling a mischance had chanced. It was easie to be seene, that these two gallant Armies, containing well neere all the strength of the whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and on the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are few of the particulars recorded in easie sort in regard of the much variety, wherewith euery soldier abounded in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon young Antiochus, whom when he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he could not be drawne backe, but left his Father naked, and lost thereby the victory. Seleucus perceiuing presently the aduantage, hee enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus; and with many troupes of horse offering to make head vpon the enemies battaile, whereseuer it lay most open, he forced the Macedonians, that a great part of them rather chose to retire from the Lord they so faithfully inured, than to sustaine the fury of so many Beasts, whose vnwonted, or rather vnkind reason of some, discouraged others, at length by, cast them all into flight, exposing their Generall to the last end of his fortune. Antigonus was then fiue score yeares old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was not fit for flight, and his high spirit could haue entertained no thought thereof, had not some of his most trusty followers, laid as many others as he could vpon him. When one that perceiued a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir, you are betrayed, he answered, Well may they, for who should serue a Master better than they? Demetrius bare him Thus pressing, to the very last, that his men could come to the reskue, he receiued so many Darts into his body, as tooke away his life, ambitious, but otherwise graceful whole, together with his troublesome life, his great ability in matter of Armes, together with his vnsatiable desire of Empire, sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends, as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed violence towards all alike, as if he had bin some Deitie neerest representing a Kingly Maiesty. This was the cause that many of his followers reuolted to his enemies; and that a great part of his Army forbore him in his last necessity. For those Kings and Princes that call all the careful indeauours of their Vassals, only duty and seruice, are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest seruices: I shall finde them selues vpon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue only that tyes subiects vnto their Soueraigne) not only the most friendly, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he liued, in part he left it to be verified vpon his sonne.

Demetrius, as he returned from the chase pursuit of young Antiochus, finding his father was gladde to saue himself, with fortie thousand horse and footmen, hasted to Ephesus, whence he sent to the Athenians, desiring them to receiue him into their place, and for his sake would suffer any extremity due vnto his offence. But they refused to receiue him, the Athenian Embassadours were driuen with a checke out of the Citie, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Cities, vnles he came not Thus, or Consulters with the Oracle. Whereas he sent Embassadours, friends. Yet was he faine to giue good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now stood in great need, & therfore was faine to speak them faire, that somtimes had grosly flattered him. But he shal liue to teach them their old language, & speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Hellespont, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrisons were euery where broken vp; the Souldiers hauing betaken themselues to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Army and Fleet, without money or meanes wherewith to sustaine him & his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in diuiding among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (hauing not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue: for to put himselfe into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himselfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to bury himselfe and his estate: He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof hee gaue all the spoyle that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses hauing beene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselues, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords: wherein Seleucus had a notable aduantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow giuen, hauing onely sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Army which Seleucus led, who tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise diuided from his owne Territory, than by the Riuer of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the diuision of all those Lands: because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that hee could of the victory, at which, neuertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted vpon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law vniuersall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselues of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slaine Antigonus the father, and driuen Demetrius the son out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The story of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Seleucus fell so passionately in loue, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to saue his sonnes life, gaue her (though she were his wife) vnto him; and how his passion was discouered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomy and Lysimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him againe into the ranke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings haue done in later times, namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, & other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, than those of the same later times haue been; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may obserue: betweene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninety and fiue, when Charles the eighth vndertooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeare One thousand fiue hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died; the Histories of those times tell vs, that all the bonds, either by the Bedde or by the Booke, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giuing his daughter to his enemy, that he recouered Cilicia from Pleistarchus, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it to his his stand in the diuision of Antigonus his possessions: for that he vnder vvas not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire; neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacy hee should haue done against the common enemy. So Pliſtarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Caſſander; whither Phila, their ſiſter, followed him ſhortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being ſent for that purpoſe by Demetrius her husband, that was not ſtrong enough to deale with Caſſander; and therefore glad to make vſe of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne proſperity, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the ſame time hee tooke to Wife a daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of Wiues being familiar with theſe Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eaſterne conqueſts) and ſo was hee by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than ſtrengthened with two friends; for neither of them wiſhed him any good, otherwiſe than might ſeeme to aduance their owne ambitious deſires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them haue been contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, ſhould ſeeke his fortune ſomewhat farther off, than ſettle his eſtate vnder their noſes. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himſelfe: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iſle of Cyprus. Now whether it were ſo, that Seleucus would faine haue ſet his new father-in-law vpon the necke of Lyſimachus; or whether he were indeede greedy of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchaſe of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keep as much Land as he could, hauing already found in Cilicia twelue thouſand talents of his fathers treaſure, that would ſerue him to make ſport a while. This refuſall ſo diſpleaſed Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be ſurrendred vnto him; which were the onely places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. Inſtead of giuing them vp, Demetrius took preſent order to haue them better manned; and ſpake it ſtoutly, That were he ouercome a thouſand times, yet would he not hire Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant diſpoſition, that would breake friendſhip with his Father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to gouerne. But the fire conſumed it ſelfe in words, which had it faſtned vpon armes, like it is that the weaker ſhould haue found friends out of enuie to the ſtronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and preuailed in Greece, but loſt in Aſia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Caſſander.

IN the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vſe the liberty, which Demetrius had beſtowed on them, were fallen by ſedition, vnder the tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their diſtempered City was ſo weakened, that it ſeemed ill able to keep off the puniſhment due to their late ingratitude. This aduantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Sauiour, to preſent himſelfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging fury. He brought againſt them all the force that hee could well ſpare from other employments; which were at that time perhaps the more, becauſe his doubtfull Eaſterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impediment to any buſineſſe that might entangle him in Greece. His firſt enterpriſe in Athens had ill ſucceſſe; a great part of his fleet periſhing in a tempeſt. But he ſoone repaired the loſſe; and (after ſome victories in Peloponneſus, where he wan diuers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, waſted the Country of Attica, and cut off all reliefe from the City, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it, any long time: for it ſtood in a barren ſoile, and wanted now the command of thoſe Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be ſtored with victuals, being alſo deſtitute of means to keep ſuch a Nauie, as might bring in ſupply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, againſt that of Demetrius. Yet was there ſome hope of ſuccour from Ptolomy, who (truſting thereby to win the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fifty ſhips with corne, and ſent them to relieue the hungry City. But the fo hundred and fifty were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therfore hafted them away betimes, as hauing done enough, in aduenturing to come so neere that they might be descried. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreame, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead Mouse, which dropped downe between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeeld vp the Towne, and craue pardon, hauing so farre offended; that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to do, than because they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not only forbeare to take away the liues of these vnthankfull men, which they had submitted vnto his mercy; but out of his liberality gaue them food, & placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuertheless he was growne wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; hee was ready to lay hold vpon the word, & leaue a sure Garrison within their wals, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedæmonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes called him in all haste, of Lysimachus and Ptolomy; that preuailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe did vpon his enemies in Greece. Lysimachus had won many Townes in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilst he was bethinking himselfe which way to turne his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater & Alexander, sought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Thessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queens death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shifted well for himselfe, at such time as euery man fought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, & a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely haue made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wal, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom she could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty, that she vsed against his friends, both aliue and dead; as it made him aduenture vpon shedding the Royall blood: wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose liues hindred his purpose, argues him to haue been rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a-far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seeks to auoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it self safe enough, vntil there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserued the bloudy end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill beseemed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deserued to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherfore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iustice brought swords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the cruelty of this bloudy man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

Of Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warre against the Greekes; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrrhus; and in his ciuill Gouernment; and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus inuade him, his Army yeelds to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lysimachus.

PYrrhus, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Aacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserued, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias King of Illyria, the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeares of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeares, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subiects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his warres, was with him in the great battell of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus, & was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, for that he married her Daughter, & was thereupon sent home, with mony & men, into Epirus: more beholding now to Ptolomy, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recouered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was setled in it, then fel out this businesse betweene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the eldest of Cassanders sons, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the commings of Demetrius, but made vp hasty agreement, and deuided the Kingdom with his younger brother Alexander, who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or rather as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his paines: vnder pretence to bring the brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter haughtily, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with his Army, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaining, whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remoue this ouer-diligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. This Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true, though the greatest part, and perhaps himself, beleeued it not. But the truth was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and slaine by Demetrius, who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder, couering the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had beene, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians, for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine he caused the remainder of Macedon to be giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. And this ill bargaine Demetrius grieuously digested, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed, vntill his Father-in-law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. Thus he liued, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide molestation, yvere slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked, as the more long) studying how to erect his owne house, that fell down vpon his graue, ere the earth on it were throughly setled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeed it shewed his infirmity, and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Gouernment: but thought (as he shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King listed. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, & the tedious discourse of doing iustice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as sixe yeares reigne is long to him, that knowes not how to reigne one yeare) he discouered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers, of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but vsed his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus hee would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as hee was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse euent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome, he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-run his enemies Country, vvith two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that faculty, wherein themselues are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, hee missed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he ouerthrew, not vvith more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; vvho being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The losse of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, saue Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captaine.

These rumours vvere not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their owne King, whom they began to dis-esteeme, not so much in regard of his vnprofitable iourny into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and serving chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers liues hee was reckelesse: & suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth, That how many of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of iustice, and (as it were) to publish vnto all his Subiects, how little he esteemed (in deed) hauing by a shew of popularity inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their writings into a Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses hee grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and inuading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed; who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to haue some feeling of the generall hate; vvhich to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great War. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a royall Army; wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus, that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horses with a Nauie of fiue hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had bin seen before; yet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to ioyne against this ambitious son of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe, what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therfore they resolued to begin with him betimes, & each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not ouer great: were it not, that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the campe was in vproare: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to vtter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to go to their owne houses; meaning indeed to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceiued the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their own countriman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ran ouer into Pyrrhus his campe; where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheaded in view of the campe, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arriuall found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius, onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bad him be gone betimes, and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himselfe poorly, did fearfully steale away out of his owne campe, deseruing well this calamity: whether it were so, that he would not harken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour deprined him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessary truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdome of Macedon, Lysimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and would needs haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre; and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaine. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better opportunity.

The Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things, with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

THe Athenians, were as vnthankfull to Demetrius in this his aduersity, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when hee went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Army, though Phila his wife (who (vvho is highly commended for a wise and vertuous Lady) did poyson her selfe, vpon desperate griefe for his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserued it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spokes-man; & taking faire words in stead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, vvith eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines that fell from Lysimachus to him, vvith their companies and treasures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazzard his last stocke against it. Wherfore, he resolued to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agathocles who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, driuing him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome Enemy, neuertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titulary King, with extreame famine. At length, in passing the riuer Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance, but were driuen to trauaile with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Country; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, and to pitty him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recouered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them, of which none tooke effect, through the lewdnesse of Seleucus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesse tooke and held him forty daies, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming been discouered by fugitiues, that gaue alarme. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents, for euen some of those few forsooke him, to yeeld vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable message. But the approbation of his owne humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his iealous thoughts, and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a deny-Iland, wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Onely his liberty was referred vnto the comming of young Antiochus and Stratonice, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three yeares, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and bloud-shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then dyed, leauing to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe, that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth, his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

CHAP. XI.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captaines: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reigne together with himselfe, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captains left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was, their neere equality of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest son: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, began to harken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Country-man, that they forsooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had reigned about fiue yeares alone; when the City of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earth-quake, appeared by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iealousie, and the infligation of a Mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his Son Agathocles; which drew vpon him that War, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteen children that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the last of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe as Lord and Heire of all the conquered World. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his dayes, and within seuen Moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloody death, being treacherously slaine by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had bin. Seuenty and seuen year old he was, when he fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuenty and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had seen the daies as it were of another World vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them in the Art of Warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before, that is now ready to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe did euer encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes that were held by Alexanders Successours, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

Chap. VII.

The growth of Rome: and setling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romanes enlarged their Dominion in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, vnto such time as they were assailed by Phyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; setled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reigne of of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italy, to ouerwhelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue been deliuered in the ages, wherein they were seuerally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two & thirty yeare vvas burnd together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchilde to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, & the City of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing reigned foure and twenty yeares, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who auoyding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, & dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of vvhich Towne he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria comming to Rome, & encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecy, he grew a fauorite of Ancus Martius, by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Romane Court, insomuch that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the City. He doubled the number of Senatours, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsemen: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his Victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned eight and thirty yeares, he was slaine by the sons of Ancus Martius, to vvhom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiuing vvhat was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was vvounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sickenesse, one Seruius Tullius, vvhom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of Corniculanus and Ocrisia, a well deserued, but captiue vvoman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouery: vvhich gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Raements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, hee managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had been a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Arunt, which had beene committed vnto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; hee (willing to adde water, not oyle, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Arunt the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who soon soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where hee thought by authority to haue bridled insolency) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had reigned forty and foure years. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus king; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising cruelty without iustice, and tyranny without mercy, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treachery vpon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Suessa, Pometia, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad succesſe. In the heat of which warre, his soane Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her owne bloud; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, & Iunius Brutus) she kil'd her self: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was deposed and banished; and fled to Porsenna king of Hetruria for succour, in the fiue and twentieth yeare of his reigne, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heauie yoke of bondage, inforced the people by solemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings goods, consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment; from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single gouernour to a double; lest perpetuall or sole dominion might bee some motiue to vsurpation; & in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Prouiders: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to bee alwayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard setling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, scarce daring to assure themselues of their owne security, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resigne vp his authority, fearing that tyranny would bee hereditary, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquine, sauoured already of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that hee might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that hee might as well in goods as in person, auoide occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to bee pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had beene a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their honour: for hauing got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne sonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished kings; hee caused them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to bee brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romans, hauing by the vnblemished integrity of Brutus, wel appeased all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their military designements against Forraines; first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuscans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but giue occasion of offence to her neighbours; which by maine opposition, hauing preuailed against her borderers, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeere of Consuls, was against Porsenna king of Hetruria: who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished king, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies on the bridge ouer Tibris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned safe to his followes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porsenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the victory, in a manner, assured by his owne; yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Scævola, (who having by errour slaine Porsenna his Secretary, in stead of the King himselfe, did in scorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) he thought it not any whit prejudiciall, either to his safety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleen, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemy, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field: and their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia, (sent in his roome (decessing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquinius upon his returne, finding the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to strive against the streame, but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteene yeares, privately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne in law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching the foile of those old repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied him their succour, stirred the Tarquines, mustred up his Latines, & gave battell to the Romans at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertaine, until Aulus Postumius the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courages, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cassius or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, two gods who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their victory; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no obiect of valour abroad, reflected upon themselues at home; and the sixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, upon instigation of some desperate bankrouts, thinking themselues wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an vproare in the holy Mount; vntill by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and belies discord, to that present occasion; they were reconciled to the Senate; with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controuersies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this atonement among themselues, they had continuall warres with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Æqui held them longest in warre, who made warre of themselues vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best City in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Marcius got the surname of Coriolanus, a name honourable then, deriued from a great victory; although, by reason of the pouerty of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would have bin ashamed of the title. But yet these gratified him no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth addressed to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people; whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, & after iudgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renue their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he preuailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within fourre or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, or will his Mother Veturia, & Volumnia his Wife, with a pitifull traine of deprecation, shewing themselues better Subiects to their Country, than friends to their Sonne and Husband, were more able to Rome, than was any force of Armes. Hereupon Coriolanus (although already, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity (as others surmise) having with them wrought all he could, and [illegible]

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans against whom the Fabij three hundred and sixe in number, all of one Family, procured and obtained, that they only might be employed; as it had bin in a priuate quarrell. These Fabij, after some good seruice, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumuented, and all slaine, one only of that whole house, had bin left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In processe of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, nine miles from Rome, where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole Army, had beene discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition dispersed his enemies, & freed his Countrie in the space of sixteen daies. In the continuance of this Volscian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had imployed before chosen Gouernours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, & all other Magistrates) would haue rauished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captaine of a company, and lying then in Campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuersitie of Captaines, and varietie of euent, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and vtterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him backe into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded him in reuerence of his iustice. The siege of Veij was ten yeers, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad vnder beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they receiued pay) & to make vowes neuer to return without victorie.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: & the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankfull to Camillus for his seruice, than before they had beene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequalitie in diuiding the spoyles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of seruice, against the fury of the Gaules, who being a populous Countrie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) liued so long, that the sonnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, seeking some place, where to set vp their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, set vpon Clusium, a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome hauing information, (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) sent Embassadours, warning them to desist from such iniurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some iniurie offered by the Romane Embassadours, conuerted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giuing a great ouerthrow vnto the Romans, by the River Allia, vpon the fifteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vnlucky, and called Aliensis in the Romane Kalendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leauing the Citie; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and euery one shifting for himselfe, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conueyed away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boldnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did seat themselues in Thrones, in their seueral houses, hourely expecting the messengers of death, & resolued to dye, as they had liued, in State. The yonger sort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoyle, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senatours, they sate in their Maiestie, with a graue resolution hauing first reuerenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would dye like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen moneths. Once they were like to haue surpriſed it by night, but being deſcried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargaine was, that the Gaules ſhould take a thouſand pound weight in gold, to deſiſt from their ſiege. Whileſt the gold was in weighing, the Gaules, with open inſolencie, made their weights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, caſting his ſword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt be patient perforce. But in the midſt of this cauilling came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his baniſhment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with ſuch violence, that hee diſperſed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their blood, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoyles with aduantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene ſo nice. Further hauing rid the Citie of them, he ſo hotly purſued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſſe. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corninus (each of which in ſingle fight ſlew a ſeuerall Champion of the Gaules) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſeruice, was afterwards accompted a ſecond Romulus.

The people, after this deſtruction of their Citie, were earneſtly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabite; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the ſiege of Veij, they changed their gouernment from Conſuls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernment of theſe alſo, after ſome yeares, was by ciuill diſſenſion interrupted: ſo that one while Conſuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Conſular authoritie was eſtabliſhed, it being enacted, that one of the Conſuls ſhould alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeeres. And now Rome by ſuppreſſion of her neighbour countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirtie miles off: ſituated between Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſo ſtrongly inuade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themſelues ſubiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatſoeuer elſe to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fiſh, ſhould deuoure the leſſe, eaſily allowed of; aiming themſelues at the good ſituation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Townes, but eſpecially Capua it ſelfe, the faireſt Citie then in all Italie.

The families of the Papyrij and Fabij were moſt imployed in the managing of this warre; which endured the ſpace of fiftie yeeres. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans oftentimes dangerouſly encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſuls, and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges loſt the field with three thouſand men. But for thoſe loſſes, many great victories made large amends: The greateſt whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but leſſe warlike Nation) began to ſtir. So the one and the other of theſe two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equall freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, ſo that they required to haue one of the Conſuls yeerely choſen out of them.

This demand of the Latines, was not vnreaſonable. For the Romans themſelues were a Latine Colonie; beſides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to bee all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any ſuch capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Conſuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Conſuls, whom the Soothſayers aduertiſed, that the ſide ſhould be victorious which loſt the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Conſull, expoſed his life to the Enemie, and purchaſed victorie (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himſelfe for his Armie, the ſonne of this Decius being after Conſull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the deſperate reſolution of theſe Decij, that purchaſed victorie, by rufhing into the midſt of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of ſuch a religion, as required the liues of ſo worthy Citizens, to be ſacrificed for their Countrie. The diſcipline of Manlius was no leſſe reſolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbad any one to forſake his place, and fight ſingle with an enemie, for breach of which order he cauſed his owne ſonne to be put to death, who had ſlaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged in ſingle fight.

When the Latines, the Æqui, Volſci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with ſome other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend againſt the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Conſull, waſting all their Countrie with fire and ſword, from the Riuer Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet ſubiection.

The laſt of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. Theſe had interpoſed themſelues as mediatours, betweene the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which ſhould dare to refuſe peace, by them tendred. Theſe threats which diſcouered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were vtterly ſubdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ſhips of theirs were robbed, and ſent Embaſſadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon ſome wrong done to theſe Embaſſadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Meſſapians, Brutians, and Apulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But ſome experience of the Roman ſtrength, taught all theſe people to know their owne weakneſſe. Wherefore they agreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, by whoſe aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines alſo were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome ſhould be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-ſpread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquiſhed them in two battailes.

Pyrrhus, forſaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lyſimachus, was compelled a while to liue in reſt: which hee abhorred no leſſe than a wiſer Prince would haue deſired. Hee had a ſtrong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnſetled eſtate of things, was enough to purchaſe a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had ſo encreaſed the power of Lyſimachus, that it was no point of wiſedome, to make an offenſiue warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the ſonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the ſame time, and ſome other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treaſures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might ſerue to giue ſome hinderance to Lyſimachus.

In this want of imployment, and couetous deſire of finding it, the Tarentine Embaſſadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide than his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would caſt themſelues vnder his protection. They had in their company, ſome of the Samnites, Lucanians, Meſſapians, and others, which promiſed, in behalfe of their ſeuerall Nations, as much as could be deſired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conqueſts; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the Weſt, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eaſtward; and that by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is ſaid, that once hee anſwered Cyneas his chiefe Counſailour, aſking what hee meant to doe after euery of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would ſoone be Maſter of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickly get the Ile of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe ouer into Affrick, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie; and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, he would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all? Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if hee could be contented with his owne.

Neuertheless, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers; part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly careless to prouide for the War. Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behouing to their estate.

Whilest hee was occupied with these cares, Leuinus the Romane Consull drew neere, and began to waste Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their own Countrie; the Samnites were careless of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselues; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driuen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italie, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiencie, which by all meanes hee was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which hee resolued to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Leuinus the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should bee ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messipians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arriue at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, hee were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemie.

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the Riuer of Siris: Leuinus intending to fight before the arriuall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that hee had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that hee might not bee compelled to fight, vntill hee saw his best aduantage. But hee quickly found, that this new enemie was not onely skilfull in the Art of war, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, began to passe the Riuer, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Armie had recouered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooued him indeed to do his best; for he neuer met with better

oppoſers. Once, and ſhortly after the fight began, his horſe was ſlaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vſe of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almoſt loſt him the battaile: but hee perceiuing it, diſcouered his face, and thereby reſtored courage to his men, and took from the Romanes their vaine ioy. The fight was obſtinate, and with the greater loſſe (at leſt of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his ſide, as long as onely ſpeare and ſword were vſed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whoſe vnuſuall forme & terrible aſpect, the horſes of the Romans (vnaccuſtomed to the like) were not able to ſuſtaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiuing their horſe put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding alſo themſelues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force and huge bulke of thoſe ſtrange beaſts; gaue way to neceſſity, and ſaued themſelues, as well as they could, by haſtie flight: in which conſternation, they were ſo forgetfull of their diſcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ran quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was ſoon ſpread ouer Italie; and the reputation was no leſſe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Conſull, with a ſelect Armie, ſhould loſe in plaine battaile, not only the Field, but the Campe it ſelfe, being ſo notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, ſaue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diſſemble his content that he took, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at ſuch time as he blamed the Lucans & Samnits, for comming (as we ſay) a day after the faire. Neuertheleſſe, hee wiſely conſidered the ſtrength of the Romans, which was ſuch, as would better endure many ſuch loſſes, than he could many ſuch victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whileſt with his honour he might; and to that purpoſe he ſent vnto them Cyneas his Embaſſadour, demanding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at reſt, and himſelf accepted as their eſpeciall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could bee found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their deſire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the riſing of many States in Italy againſt them, ſo incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senatour, did ſtirre them vp to make good their honour by war. So they returned anſwer, that whileſt Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puiſſance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great deſire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices paſſed between them: but ſtill when he vrged his motion of peace, the anſwer was, He muſt firſt depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, each part made prouiſion for war; the Romanes leuying a more mighty army than the former; & Pyrrhus being ſtrengthened with acceſſe vnto his forces, of all the Eaſt parts of Italy. So they came to triall of a ſecond battaile, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boiſterous violence of the Elephants gaue to Pyrrhus a ſecond victorie. But this was not altogether ſo ioyful as the former had been: rather it gaue him cauſe to ſay, that ſuch another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For he had loſt the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romanes into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor ſaw any likelihood of preuailing againſt them, that were like to be relieued with daily ſupplies, whileſt he ſhould be driuen to ſpend vpon his old ſtock. Neither could he expect, that his Elephants ſhould alwaies ſtand him in ſtead. A little knowledge of their maner in fight, would ſoon teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in ſuch learning, how to make them vnſeruiceable. Wherefore hee deſired nothing more, than how to carry his honour ſafe out of Italy: which to doe (ſeeing the Romans vvould not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a flight occaſion, preſented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being inuited into Sicill, forsoke Italie; wan the most of the Ile; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returnes into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romanes, and so goes backe to his own Kingdome.

WHen Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor & Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had bin the due reward vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himself against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnesse of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselues that his reigne might proue good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the kingdome. As for Antigonus the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neere vnto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to reuenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in money than in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three stroue about the kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatning warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes he strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting mony of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to haue them restored at two yeares end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enioy his kingdome.

Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her he circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere hee slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that he neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselues, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lye on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadours came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue: His answer was, That he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeelde vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, That they would soone confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proude words. It may seeme strange, that that he, who had giuen away part of his Army vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; ſhould bee ſo confident in vndertaking more mighty enemies. The king of the Dardanians offered to lend him twentie thouſand men againſt the Gaules: but he ſcorned the offer; ſaying, That he had the children of thoſe, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had ſubdued all the Eaſt. Thus hee iſſued forth againſt all the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie muſt needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But he ſoone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not onely equall in ſtrength of body, and fierceneſſe of courage, but ſo farre ſuperiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none eſcaped their furie. Ptolomie himſelfe grieuouſly wounded, fell into their hands, whileſt the battell continued; and they preſently ſtrooke off his head, which they ſhewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter aſtoniſhment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with ſuch deſperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole countrey as loſt. Onely Soſthenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a ſmall Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vſing the victorie at his whole pleaſure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King; which title he refuſed, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as miſchiefes doe ſeldome come alone) the good ſucceſſe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gaules, with an hundred and fifty thouſand foot, and fifteen thouſand horſe; againſt which mightie Army, when Soſthenes with his weake troupes made oppoſition, hee was eaſily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themſelues within their wals, leauing all their Countrie to the ſpoyle of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians deſtitute of a king, & troden down by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in leſſe than fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who ſought to diſcouer and ſubdue vnknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Perſia, had been too little for a king of Macedon.

Very ſeaſonably had theſe newes been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who ſought a faire pretext of relinquiſhing his warre with the Romanes; had not other tydings out of Sicil diſtracted him, and carried him away in purſuite of neerer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned ouer the whole Iſland, the Carthaginians ſent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did ſo faſt prevaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoyde ſlauery, than in ſubmitting themſelues to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, beeing a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracuſans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Eſtates of the Iſle, ſent Embaſſadours, earneſtly deſiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two ſuch notable occaſions, of inlarging his Dominions, ſhould fall out ſo vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the buſineſſe of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeued (as came after to paſſe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not ſo haſtily paſſe away, but that he might finde ſome occaſion to lay hold on it, at better leiſure, ouer into Sicil he tranſported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to ſhift for themſelues, yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garriſon in their Town, to hold them in ſubiection.

As his departure out of Italy, was rather grounded on head-long paſſion, than mature aduice; ſo were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note-worthy. The Armie which he carried into that Iſle, conſiſted of thirty thouſand foote, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſe: with which, ſoon after his deſcent into Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He alſo won the ſtrong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battell; he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Soſtratus (to whom his cruelty was ſuſpect) out of the Iland, & put Thenon of Syracuſe to death, being iealous of his greatneſſe; which two perſons had faithfully ſerued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuſe into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined ſo faſt, as he ſerued himſelfe, and ſalued the diſ-reputation of his leauing Sicil, by an Embaſſage ſent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his preſent helpe againſt againſt the Romans, who ſince his leauing Italy, had wel-neere diſpoſſeſt them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occaſion, he imbarked for Italy; but was firſt beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his paſſage, and ſecondly aſſayled in Italy it ſelfe, by eighteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the ſtraits of the Countrie. Laſtly, after he had recouered Tarentum, he fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italy, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than conſtant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for ſome other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one countrey or kingdome, it is to bee thought, that hee would haue purchaſed no leſſe honour than any man of warre, either preceding or ſucceeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where found. But hee neuer ſtaied vpon any enterpriſe; which was, indeede, the diſeaſe hee had, whereof not long after hee died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus, the ſonne of Demetrius, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

THe vertue of Softhenes being too weake to defend the kingdome of Macedon, and the fortune which had accompanied him againſt Belgius, failing him in his attempts againſt Brennus: the Macedonians were no leſſe glad to ſubmit themſelues vnto the gouernment of Antigonus, than they had been formerly deſirous to free themſelues from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and Treaſure beſeeming a king, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vſe againſt the Barbarians, onely thoſe forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wiſhes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine ſtrength of his Armie, was gone to ſpoyle the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behind him, than he thought neceſſary to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteene thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Theſe could not be idle, but thought to get ſomewhat for themſelues, in the abſence of their fellowes: and therefore ſent vnto Antigonus, offering to ſell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuſe. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation, by condeſcending to their proud demands: yet he iudged it vnfit to exaſperate their furious choler, by vncourteous words or vſage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore hee entertained their Embaſſadours in very louing and ſumptuous manner, with a royall feaſt: wherein he expoſed to their view, ſuch abundance of maſſie gold and ſiluer, that they were not ſo much delighted with the meat, as with ſight of the veſſels, wherein it was ſerued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderſtand, how great a Prince hee was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewiſe did ſhew vnto them his Campe and Nauie, but eſpecially his Elephants. But all this brauery ſerued onely to kindle their greedy appetites; who ſeeing his ſhips heauie loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himſelfe (as it ſeemed) ſecure, and his men, both in ſtrength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules, thought all time loſt, wherein they ſuffered the preſent poſſeſſours, to ſpend the riches which they accompted aſſuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of ſpoyle and purchaſe: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his campe, where they expected a greater bootie, than the victory ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and ſuddaine; yet not ſo ſuddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who, diſtruſting the courage of his own men, diſlodged ſomewhat before their arriuall, and conueighed himſelfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where hee lay cloſe.

The Gaules, finding his Campe forſaken, were not haſtie to purſue him, but fell to ranſacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either loſt or hidden. At length, when they had ſearched euery place in vaine, angrie at their loſt loſt labour, they marched with all ſpeed towards the Sea-ſide; that they might fall vpon him, whileſt he was buſie in getting his men and carriages a ſhip-board. But the ſucceſſe was no way anſwerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were ſo careleſſe of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the ſpoyle of what they found on the ſhore, and in ſuch ſhips as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had ſaued it ſelfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were ſome well experienced men of war: who diſcouering the much aduantage offred vnto them, by the deſperate preſumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold vpon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great reſolution, gaue ſo braue a charge vpon the diſordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldneſſe was thereby changed into ſuddaine feare, and they, after a great ſlaughter, driuen to caſt themſelues into the ſeruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, cauſed all the barbarous Nations in thoſe quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and reſiſtleſſe oppreſſors of ſo many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To ſpeake more of the Gaules in this place, and to ſhew how, about theſe times, three Tribes of them paſſed ouer into Aſia the leſſe, with their warres and conqueſts there; I hold it needleſſe: the victorious armies of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, ſhall giue better occaſion, to rehearſe theſe matters briefly.

Howſoeuer the good ſucceſſe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victory, could not thereupon be perſwaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no intereſt in the honour of the ſeruice, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as preſently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not ſo much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie ſtood vpon hard tearmes, had ſent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in caſe it were denied. So was hee fine to get, either a ſupply, wherewith to continue his warre againſt the Romans, or ſome ſeeming honourable pretence, to forſake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in ſeeking reuenge. The threats which he had vſed in brauery, meere neceſſitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practiſe.

He brought home with him, eight thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe: an armie too ſmall to be employed, by his reſtleſſe nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what ſpoyle he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his firſt entrance into this buſineſſe, two thouſand of Antigonus his Souldiers reuolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, eaſily perſwaded the courage of this daring Prince, to ſet vpon Antigonus himſelfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no deſire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wiſeſt way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Country. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a ſtreight paſſage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elphants, which were thought the beſt of his ſtrength: a manifeſt proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very brauely ſuſtained Pyrrhus his impreſſion; yet were broken at length (when moſt of them were ſlaine) after a ſharpe fight: wherein it ſeems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the ſtreight, and not aduancing to their ſuccour, tooke away their courage by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken ſoone after; who finding themſelues expoſed to the ſame violence that had conſumed ſo many of the Gaules, yeelded themſelues and the beaſts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great diſcomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their ſtrength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficultie (if not impoſſible) to force it. But the Macedonians had ſeene ſo much, that they had no deſire to fight againſt Pyrrhus; who diſcouered ſo well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neere in person, and exhort them to yeelde. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to leuie it. But whileſt he was thinking how to allure a ſufficient number of the Gaules into his ſeruice; whereby he might repaire his loſſe: Ptolomie, the ſonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and eaſily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flye from the parts about Macedon, to thoſe Townes a farre off in Peloponneſus, in which hee had formerly lurked, before ſuch time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himſelfe a King.

This good ſucceſſe reuiued the ſpirits of the Epirot, and cauſed him to forget all ſorrow of his late miſ-fortunes in the Roman warre: ſo that he ſent for his ſonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garriſon, in the Caſtle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conqueſt, and let the Italians ſhift for themſelues.

How Pyrrhus aſſailed Sparta without ſucceſſe. His enterpriſe vpon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing ſhould be able to withſtand him; ſeeing, that in open fight, he had vanquiſhed the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, not, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of ſuch name and worth, as deſerued to bee ſet vp againſt him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what hee pleaſed. He raiſed therefore an Armie, conſiſting of fiue and twenty thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre againſt Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to thoſe Townes in Peloponneſus, which the ſame Antigonus held in ſubiection; though it was eaſily diſcouered, that ſuch great preparations were made, for accompliſhment of ſome deſigne more important, than warre againſt a Prince already vanquiſhed, and almoſt vtterly deiected. Eſpecially the Lacedæmonians feared this expedition, as made againſt their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himſelfe to Pyrrhus, who readily entertained him, and promiſed to reſtore him to his kingdome. This promiſe was made in ſecret; neither would Pyrrhus make ſhew of any diſpleaſure that hee bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwiſe profeſſed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger ſonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble diſcipline. With ſuch colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where preſently he demeaned himſelfe as an open enemie: excuſing himſelfe and his former diſſembling words, with a ieſt; That hee followed herein the Lacedæmonian cuſtome, of concealing what was truely purpoſed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deale in like ſort with others, whom, in the time of their greatneſſe, they ſought to oppreſſe: but now they complained of that, as falſhood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practiſed in wiſedome, till it made them diſtruſted, forſaken, and almoſt contemptible. Neuertheleſſe, they were not wanting to themſelues in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; cauſing ſuch as could beare armes, to reſerue themſelues freſh againſt the aſſault: which Pyrrhus had vnwiſely deferred, vpon aſſurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwiſe than with armed Citizens: ſoone after this, (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the moſt part, hard to approach) the lower & more acceſſible places, were fenced with wals; at the preſent, only trenches were caſt, & barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance ſeemed moſt eaſie. Three daies together it was aſſailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no leſſe ſtoutly defended. The deſperate courage of the Citizens preſerued the Town the firſt day: vvherinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the ſecond day, but that his vvounded horſe threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindefull of ſauing the perſon of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torne in sunder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men, and Areus the king returned out of Crete (where hee had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne Countrie stood, vntill hee was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had beene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meete the enemie in plaine fielde, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise to deliuer that City into his hands.

Ciuill dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seueral factions to call in Pyrrhus & Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two kings pretended himselfe to bee. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to saue them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus: and that hee would bee gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needes perswade them, that hee had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argiues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gaue Hostages to assure his word: for hee was the weaker, and stood in neede of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages hee would giue none, to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceipt. This made them suspect his purpose to bee such, as, indeede, it was. Yet hee lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giuing such a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should bee opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backes, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those towers, with the trouble thereto belonging; did both giue alarme to the Citie, and some leasure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantguard) beeing ignorant of the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-passage: and setting vpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noyse, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their relieue, and assurance of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeede, the comming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to haue retired out of the City, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue backe, so did others thrust forward, and the Argiues pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait, with his owne sword:

sword. The tops of the houses were couered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne son in danger in case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, she took a tile-stone or slate, and threw it forviolently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow, and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restlesse ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life. And thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the body, and the children of his enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helenus his son, which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon, the posterity of Seleucus reigned ouer Asia and Syria, and the house of Ptolomie had quiet possession of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the setled rule of Alexanders Successers in the East, vntill the Romans, preuailing ouer all, made Conquest of ASIA and MACEDON.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Chap. I.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

Discussion of that probleme of Liuie; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

THAT question handled by Liuie, whether the great Alexander could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath bin, & is, the subiect of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides doe not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen of the Roman power, in his dayes. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, & little store of money, or of other needfull helpes in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their Estate, when it was well setled, & held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was abundantly prouided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of employment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well setled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, & foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more;) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdicas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes Ptolomie, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded onely some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needelesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had aboundance; the Roman hauing nought, saue meat and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Nauigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weake they would haue proued in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not wel deserue to be layd in ballance, against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeede, than valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: let vs onely coniecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nerest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Gracians, neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselues vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselues, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that Alexanders comming into those parts, would haue brought excessiue ioy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subiects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africke, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall we thinke that they would haue beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neere them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whosoeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Liuie hath iudged this a matter worthy of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liuie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equall to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our iudgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinkes it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardeates and Aricini, that stroue about a piece of land, saying, That it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselues.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answer: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no sauage or vnmanly people; the enemy being farre superiour vnto vs in number, and all needefull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In

In what sort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what sort the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armies as commonly conquered: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnderstand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very seldome, able to stand, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them haue vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensiue and defensiue, were of greater vse, than those with which any other Nation hath serued, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well obserueth) was a part of her happinesse; that she was neuer ouer-laied with too great warres at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that hauing at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines; hauing won the State of Alba, against which she aduentured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latium: she did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppressed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their own doores. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Ætolians. The warres against Antiochus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gaue to Rome small cause of boast, though much of ioy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sicil, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by vsing her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say, That among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my iudgement seeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Iulius Cæsar: and that no Roman armie was comparable vnto that, which serued vnder the same Cæsar. Likewise, it is apparant, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaule; was neuertheless vtterly dishearned, when Cæsar led it against the Germans. So that we may iustly impute, all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæsars men, to their long exercise, vnder so good a Leader, in so great a war. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deedes done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall seruice; the things performed in the same Countrie, by our common English Souldiers, leuied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beleeue Cæsar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Cæsars time; France was inhabited by the Gaules, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them assistance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in sunder (as Cæsar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it appliable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not onely in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arioustus, with his Germans, had ouer-run the Countrie, and held much part of it in subiection, little different from meere slauery: yea, so often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gaules, that the Gaules (who had sometimes beene the better Souldiers) did hold themselues no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France beene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere-this time, would haue bin ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, he found the whole Country setled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one [a] Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; [b] another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for monye. The Country lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cæsar himselfe doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their own hardinesse was ouer-maistered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their wals, as more than humane vvorkes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman, than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worse, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that vvas found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreame disaduantages, for feare, lest their Companies should fall asunder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they vvere ready to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (vvhich vvas little lesse than all this) great oddes in vveapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or vvhat other vvorldly helpe, than the golden mettall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselues therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Iohn de Serres.

Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequalitie that vvas betweene the French and English, when their King Iohn was ready to giue the on-set, vpon the Blacke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. Iohn had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, Countrie, and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choise of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

IEAN auoit tout l'auantage par dessus EDOVARD, le numbre, la force, le lustre, le pay, le preuue (qui n'est pas communement vne consideration de peu d'importance aux affaires du monde) & auec son Pelite de sa Caualleric, lors estimee la meilleure de tout son Royaume.

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriours. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Liuie rightly tearmes them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that haue read of Cressie and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alleadge the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe whereof hath left many a hundred better markes, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse or sickenesse, or a sore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnseruiceable. More particularly, I say, that it vvas the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanke: and so shall he perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all obiection: for vvhen two Armies are vvithin the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be deliuered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How thers came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battailes, hauing no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historians: who relating the victory of our men at Creuant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words: The English comes with a conquering bravery, as he, that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: he forceth our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where he tels, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and fiue hundred of their owne men in English Cassocks; hoping that the very sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius, report wonders of our Nation:) the proposition which first I vndertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all aduantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Bellipotentes sunt magè quàm sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue onely King Henrie the fift, the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Cæsar? why not after the Macedonian war? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit opportunitie, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Country of Gaule had lately wasted. Surely the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gaules, for preseruation of their owne safetie. Iohn de Serres.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, vntill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other side, held onely the one halfe of our owne Iland, the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vnlesse perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) euery way equall to our selues; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backes; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a stronger inuasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is still, with men, that haue pleased themselues, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their iudgement, if any vse vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the diuided vertue of this our Iland, hath giuen more noble proofe of it selfe, than vnder so worthy a Leader, that Roman Armie could do, which afterwards ouer-came with Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæsar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath conuerted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wish, that auoiding vs, he had rather encountred as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aside comparisons, we returne to the rehearsall of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to striue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punicke warre.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

THE Citie of Carthage had stood aboue sixe hundred yeares, vvhen first it began to contend with Rome, for the mastrie of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchiuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and fiue hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities: and subiected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicill; and of Sicill, the better part. It flourished about seuen hundred and thirty yeares, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other spoyles, and all that the Souldiers reserued, carried thence foure hundred and seuenty thousand weight of siluer, which make of our mony (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie ran the same fortune, vvhich many other great ones haue done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the vvhole.

b The Turkes, at this day, doe also take the one halfe of the poore mans corne, that labors the earth: yea, they take tribute both of the bodies, and of the soules of the Christians their Vassals, by bereauing them of their ablest children, and bringing them vp in the Mahometan Religion. The Irish take the fourth sheafe: and were wont to eate vp with their horsmen, footmen, and dogges, what they pleased, of the other three parts remaining. The husbandman and the yeoman of England, are the freest of all the World: And reason good: for of them haue the bodies of our victorious armies bin compounded. And it is the freeman, and not the slaue, that hath courage and the sense of shame deserued by cowardise. How free the English yeomen haue beene, in times, not long since past, Fortescue hath shewed in his praise of our Coûtries laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than euer: and our Nobilitie and Gentrie more seruile. For, since the excessiue braury, and vaine expence of our Grandes, hath taught them to raise their Rents, since by Inclosures, and dismembring of Mannours, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentrie of England, haue beene dissolued, the Tenants, hauing payed vnto their Lords their racke Rent, owe them now no seruice at all, and (perchance) a little loue.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Gensericus the Vandal, by Belisarius vnder Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, sauing that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it selfe was aboue twenty miles in compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue been twice as great.

It had three wals, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, & Granaries for their prouender. They had also lodgings in these streets, betweene these out-walles for foure thousand horse-men, and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by those of China) neuer pestered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa; to which Servius gines two and twentie furlongs in compasse, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when she got leaue to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compasse with an Oxe hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastned to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but seuenty foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this standing Sea vvas built a most sumptuous Arsenall, hauing their ships and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common-weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulare Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well obserueth) the people in later times vsurped too great authoritie in their Councels. This confusion in gouernement, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruin, were their auarice and their cruelty. [a] Their auarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one [b] halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle & mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendred them odious to their vassals, whom it made ready, vpon all occasions to reuolt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse receiued, haue desperately cast themselues with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared to manage their owne best proiects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceiued them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the vnhappy Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had prosperous euent. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, auarice, craft, vnfaithfulnesse, and periurie. Whether the Romans themselues themselues were free from the same crimes, let the triall be referred vnto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing bin made, the yeare following the expulsion of Tarquine. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Africk, nor suffer any ship of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, vnlesse it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Hauen in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoeuer it hath pleased Liuie to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romanes to haue trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iland of Sardinia. Liu. Dec. 1. l. 7.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africk; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselues might haue the better meanes to occupie all Sicill, vvhilest that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon vve find good cause, of the ioy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty and fiue pound, sent from thence to Rome, vvhen the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mighty Armie of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, Xenoph. Grec. hist. l. 1. wan only two Cities therein: many great fleets were deuoured by tempests; and howsoeuer the Carthaginians preuailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, & take reuenge vpon those Inuaders. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie, in making their aduantage, of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where he made sharp warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, vvhich had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman vvarre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; vvho declared in their name, that they were sorry to heare, vvhat misaduenture had befallen the Romans, their good freinds, in this vvar with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italie, if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots.

It was indeed, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: vvhich caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans vvere too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued, with couenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reseruation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vsing all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a steppe into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor sauer, yet he cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first vndertaking had bin so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleeue, that an higher prouidence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inueterate, that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an haruest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had bin the more. Wherfore they re-continued their former courses; and and by force of practice, recouered in few yeares, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselues to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, & finding themselues too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious cruelnie, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselues Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approoue their barbarous treachery, added rage vnto their stoutnesse. Hauing therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouer-ranne all the Countrie round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbor places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her backe to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast vpon them, & finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Gouernors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Armie elected two Gouernours among themselues, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie he vsed at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Gouernour. This Office, he rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie, and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought, to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily moued to sedition & tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, he tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two seuerall parts, he marched away vnder the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in peces by the assieged: So returning home, and leuying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, he hasted againe towards Messana, & was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Mylæus, where he obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captaine into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent, was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselues vtterly infeebled, some of them resolued to giue themselues to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the seuerall factions dispatched Embassadours for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone ready to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne releiued for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage, who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messana, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once bin theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of iniuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred in to a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messana; the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whileſt Hieron with his Syracuſians, lay before it on the other side.

Mamertines

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Conſull, with an Armie to the ſtreights of Sicil: which paſſing by night with notable audacitie; he put himſelfe into the Towne, and ſending Meſſengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; ſignifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reaſon would not preuaile.

This meſſage was vtterly neglected; And ſo beganne the vvarre betweene Rome and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to ſhew, on which part was the iuſtice of the quarrell, when ſome actions of the Romanes lately foregoing this, haue beene firſt conſidered.

§. III.

The beginning of the firſt Punick Warre. That it was vniuſtly vndertaken by the Romanes.

WHen Pyrrhus began his wars in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more diſtruſting the Carthaginians, as likely to ſeize vpon it in that buſie time, ſought aide from the Romans, & obtained from them a Legion, conſiſting of 4. thouſand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended & aſſured for the preſent. But after a while, this Roman Garriſon, conſidering at good leiſure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Meſſana, (a Citie in Sicil, ſituate almoſt oppoſite to Rhegium, and no otherwiſe diuided than by a narrow Sea, which ſevereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatneſſe of the bootie, than the odiouſneſſe of the villanie, by which it was gotten; reſolued finally, to make the like purchaſe, by taking the like wicked courſe. Confederating therefore themſelues with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hoſts of Rhegium, after the ſame manner; diuiding the ſpoile, and all which that State had, among themſelues.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly ſtained (for no Nation in the world made a more ſeuere profeſſion of iuſtice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatneſs) reſolued, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed ſhortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie by Pyrrhus. For, notwithſtanding that thoſe Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulneſſe of their fact, hopeleſſe of pardon) defended themſelues with an obſtinate reſolution: yet in the end, the aſſailants forced them; and thoſe which eſcaped the preſent furie, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the vſuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the cuſtome of the Countrie, they had their heads ſtricken from their ſhoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe reſtored to their former libertie and eſtates.

This execution of Iuſtice being newly performed, and the fame thereof ſounding honourably through all quarters of Italie: meſſengers came to Rome, from Meſſana, deſiring helpe againſt the Carthaginians, and Syracuſians, that were in a readineſſe to inflict the like puniſhment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent requeſt it vvas, vvhich they made: who hauing both giuen example of that villanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioint forces to make it good, doe intreat the Iudges to giue them that aſſiſtance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow-theeues.

The Romans could not ſuddenly reſolue, whether the vvay of honeſtie or of profit, were to be followed; they euermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They conſidered, how contrary the courſe of ſuccouring the Mamertines was to their former counſells, and actions: ſeeing for the ſame offences they had lately put to torment, and to the ſword, their owne Souldiers, and reſtored the oppreſſed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the deſcription of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the beſt part of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spaine; and ſome part of Sicill it ſelfe; whileſt alſo they feared, that Syracuſe

therein
